When the brave dead lay round thee on the plain?
Of those who, fighting 'neath thy folds, expiring,
That seemed so full of sadness and of yearning?

Well mayst thou droop, old flag: thy memory hallows
Those hero-graves that now thou dids't win by scars;
Thou'rt not at home 'mid those robustious fellows
Our City Fathers. In their vanity wars
Upon the dead, and trample on their dinner
To thee they are but publicans and sinners.

Hadst thou at once, in days, alas! departed,
Thy pulses still with valor at thy back,
How wouldst thou charge, flag of the noble-hearted!
Through fight and death, to victory's Hallowed Mark!
Old flag, thou'st had full many a day of glory,
But none like that would be so famed to story.

Yet 'tis a glorious thing to die in battle column:
E'en thus with evil-doers thou mayst cope,
In thou a calm rebuke—a lesson solemn
For those that live, and for those that hope!
All other means have failed: if thou achieve it
'Twill shake the public virtue to believe it.

A WAIF.—One day last week a young gentleman was seen walking slowly through the crowd of pedestrians in the Central Park, with his eyes to the sky at the end of his cane a chignon, as those heavy lumps of hair are technically called, with which the young ladies of the present day disfigure in decorating the nape of their necks. As the chignon-hunter walked along, evidently thoroughly aroused him, it was most suggestive to observe the almost involuntary manner in which he would raise his hat whenever young women pressed raised their hands to the backs of their heads. It was also remarkable that the chignon was all right and tight. Whether the gentleman was merely playing the trick for the fun of the thing, or whether he had really picked up a lump of false hair which somebody had lost accidentally or wilfully, will probably never be known; but the sensation which the incident caused undoubtedly proved that the young ladies were all right as far as strides of concealment.

THE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF THE NEARLY EIGHTY YEARS AGO.—The following perhaps appears in "Arthur Young's Travels in Ireland," published at Dublin in 1779. The date of the sum of £100,000 would be worth taken at October 31, 1767: "In the evening to Monsieur Lemond, a very intelligent Frenchman, who has established here an improvement in the jenny spinning cotton. . . . He electrifies the water in a pipe by which it runs, and by a wire to the north or south point; he has it with him into a room, and shows the wire, which is a small one, passed out of the pipe into a tub of water, a small fine pin in a tub, a wire connects with a cylinder, and discharges at a distance sparks of fire, which, by the electrical corresponding motion of the ball, writes down the words." Saxon laughed good-humoredly.

"Do you really want your question answered?" said he.

"Of course."

"Then wait a minute while I fetch my gun." He rose as he spoke, and presently reappeared outside the window, rifle in hand.

"Look there," he said, pointing to the roof of the stables. "A young hawfinch is creeping to it. It was a gift cock, like that which Goethe used to admire, as a child, on the Ober Main. Thor at Frankfort, and just then alighting with the breeze, and flashing in the sunshine like a yellow diamond. The Earl threw up the window and leaned out.

"I should think so," he replied. "I have seen it preen nearly every day of my life ever since I was born."

"How far off is it do you think?"

"Well, I hardly know; perhaps six hundred yards. But you can't hit a thing that blazes like a comet, and is never still for two seconds together."

"It's an ugly bird," said Saxon, bringing his gun to his shoulder. "Do you think he'll look more like a comet if I hit him in the head?"

The words were no sooner out of his lips than he fired. Lord Castlecovers snatched up his hat and bounded down upon the sward.

"You haven't done it!" he exclaimed. "It's impossible!"

"Let us go and see."

They had to go round by the front of the house and across the yards to reach those of the Puddings over which the vane was placed. When they had gone about two-thirds of the distance the Earl suddenly stood still.

There was a small round hole drilled through precisely that part of the cock's head where his eye ought to have been.

At the sight of his friend's dumb amazement Saxon roared with laughter, like a young giant.

"There," said he, "I told you it would be an improvement. And now you see why I wouldn't compete for the cup. We Swiss are always shooting from the time we are old enough to carry a gun, and I didn't want to spoil the sport for the others. It wouldn't have been fair."

TO THE FLAG OF THE FORTY-SEVENTH NEW YORK.

Our flag, we must again! In peace and quiet
Has been thine home, since the last battle-cry
As idle trophy! Done with war and riot,
Thou hangest here, in our City Hall.
Can I believe my eyes? Let's down and see
Of how much glory what a lame conclusion!

That thou, that once amid the sons of thunder
Went shouting on the battle-field before the fight,
Shouldst rest at last amid these sons of plunder—
Our aldermanic children of the night!
The go-burs blue; it feels thy degradation,
Its sky-dome, only equal, I must have there
More names. Thou'rt not the dame to shrink around thee
Into murky wreaths that dim thy stripes and stars;
Here in thy prison-house, where Fate hath bound thee,
Thou'rt still the same bright flag of Liberty!
Thou lookest down on placemen and contractors,
Thugs," and each "Boss" that rules the City Hall.

No more thou flauntest in the line of battle;
Thine blighted place is at some civic feast:
Thou hear'st the music, but not thine mate:
'Tis not a martial sound, to say the least.
How like thou art to the more thou emblest of powder
Those fumes are all of abdominable chowder.

Dost thou not dream sometimes amid the laughter—
Amid the music's soft, voluptuous strain—
Of those stern nights, the long day's struggle after,
When the brave dead lay round thee on the plain?
Of those who, fighting 'neath thy folds, expiring,
That seemed so full of sadness and of yearning?

Well mayst thou droop, old flag: thy memory hallows
Those hero-graves that now thou dids't win by scars;
Thou'rt not at home 'mid those robustious fellows
Our City Fathers. In their vanity wars
Upon the dead, and trample on their dinner
To thee they are but publicans and sinners.

A RESPECTABLE CONTRIBUTOR.—A gentleman of Toronto on the road between Scarboro and Pettyroy, might recently have been seen driving a heavy cart-load of building stone to a short walking-stick cane. The train, descending on this, at the rate of forty miles of water, down-hill and under this novel umbrella the inventor walked, as carefully protected from the rain as if the heavens had not been above him. Crowds of people witnessed the occurrence, but very few, very few, it is asserted, M. Dredge will make known his secret.

No man ever felt any thing but irritation at seeing a woman's gown caught in the door of the crowded car-steps, or attached any value to the amusement of open work dinner-parties. Such people can be taught by experience, but will believe it—or rather, perhaps, if they did but attach any importance to it when they go before the jury, we shall be perfectly satisfied with their appearance, or far as these circumstances are concerned, they are particulars we positively clean and their stockings guiltless of a wrinkle. We trust that these further observations will not be to be attended without some expenditure of money; for cleanliness, we are told, is next to godliness, and we should be sorry to see any one of our readers known to make a dress. But, any rate, the proposed machine is a good deal more simple and inexpensive than the spiritless one-horse chay which the Earl had selected for the race, and the whole party could, if they liked, drive back in it. Saxon, who had no money to spend but his own, and was fond of his gun, and of tiring with both hands, was particularly pleased with the scheme, and was the first to change the next time they came to look over their militiamen's kits.

RECREATION.—Recreation is intended to the mind, as whetting is to the scythe, to sharpen the edge of it, which otherwise would grow dull and blunt. He, therefore, who spends his whole time in recreation is our whetting, never mowing; his grass may grow, and his stead starve—so, contrarily, he that always toils and never recreates is ever mowing, never whetting; labouring much to little purpose. A good medium is to order. Then only doth the work go forward, when the scythe is so reasonably and moderately whetted, that it be not cut, and so cut that it may have the help of sharpening.

THE PRITCHARD MURDERS.

Doctor Edward William Pritchard, who has just been tried in Scotland for poisoning to death his wife and mother-in-law, was born in 1825 at Southsea, Hants, England. His father was a captain in the Royal Navy. In 1840, after the usual preliminary education, Pritchard was apprenticed to two surgeons of considerable practice in Portsmouth. On the completion of his apprenticeship he came to London, and after a course of study at King's College became assistant surgeon in her Majesty's Navy. Not satisfied with the circumstances of his position he proceeded to Glasgow, and began a private practice. He was quite successful, both as a practitioner and as a contributor to several medical journals.

Thus far Dr. Pritchard's life has nothing in it to attract attention. Two years ago an event occurred which, in the minds of many, excited a suspicion in relation to his character. A servant girl in his house was burned to death under circumstances which showed that she was either drunk to insensibility, or had been heavily drugged; and in either case it was hard to account either for the cause of the fire or Dr. Pritchard's ignorance of its existence. An inquest was held in the house, over which the police looked singularly gloomy, and about which very pertinent questions were put to Dr. Pritchard. It was suspected then, and now it is confidently believed, that Dr. Pritchard had some secret reason for silencing this girl—probably her demands for money—drugged her, and then set fire to the room, trusting, as it proved rightly, that the death would be attributed to helpless intoxication.

It was in November last, apparently, when Dr. Pritchard determined to kill his mother-in-law and his wife. For this purpose he resorted to a gradual process of poisoning. He seems to have been puzzled at first what sort of poison to employ, and purchased a most extraordinary array, two ounces of tartar emetic and five and a half of tincture of aconite, and unusual quantities of strychnine, conium (hemlock), tartarum, and digitalin, and at last decided on antimony. The great symptom produced by antimony is sickness, and he had resolved to account for Mrs. Taylor's, his mother-in-law's, death as that of a secret drunkard—an idea suggested by her use of opium—and for the death of his wife by gastric fever during the first months of pregnancy. At this time the Doctor's family consisted of Dr. Pritchard and his wife, four children, two young physicians boarding with the family, and two servants, Catherine Lattimer, the cook, and Mary M'Leod, nurse and house-maid. The history of the tragedy extends from the month of November, 1864, to the death of Mrs. Pritchard, on the 18th of March, 1865. The Doctor began first to poison his wife. The antimony, which was administered in her food, sometimes produced a slight and temporary illness, and then again, confined her to her bed for several days.

Toward the close of November Mrs. Pritchard went to her mother's at Edinburgh, unattended by the Doctor, and remained until Christmas. During her absence she was entirely free from sickness, but very soon after her return to her husband's care the unfavorable symptoms returned. On the night of the 1st of February the attack was particularly severe. Soon after this, at Dr. Pritchard's suggestion, Dr. Cowan, a distant relative of Mrs. Pritchard, called upon them, and while there Mrs. Pritchard had another violent attack. Dr. Cowan suggested that Mrs. Taylor, her mother, should be at once summoned to take care of her, and this led to the addition to the family of Mrs. Taylor about the middle of February. At the same time Catherine Lattimer, the cook, went away, her place being taken by Mary Paterson. After Mrs. Taylor's arrival Mrs. Pritchard grew worse continually. Her attacks came on usually about half an hour after eating. She was so completely prostrated by the poison that she was now for nearly all the time confined to her bed. But Mrs. Taylor herself was now included in Dr. Pritchard's scheme, and with her quick work was made. Scarcely had she been in the house a week before her case had been made a complete one. She had frequently expressed wonder at the course of her daughter's illness, and toward the last began to think it resembled her own. The night of her death she was about early in the evening, but at length was attacked so violently that Dr. Paterson, a professor in the medical school at Glasgow, was sent for. Dr. Paterson, on his arrival at the house, was taken apart by Pritchard, who informed him that his mother-in-law had been suddenly attacked while writing a letter, and had fallen upon the floor. About an hour and a half had now elapsed since she had been conveyed to her bed up stairs. Dr. Paterson asked Pritchard if he could assign any reason for the suddenness of the attack. He replied that his mother-in-law and Mrs. Pritchard had been partaking of some bitter beer at supper, soon after which they both became sick and vomited, and both complained that the beer was more bitter to the taste than usual. Pritchard also insinuated that Mrs. Taylor was in the habit of occasionally indulging in drink. He stated too that his wife had been suffering a long time from gastric fever.

Upon going up stairs to Mrs. Taylor's bedroom Dr. Paterson found the patient lying upon her right side on the edge of the bed with her clothes on. Mrs. Pritchard had come up on hearing of her mother's danger, and occupied the same bed. Mrs. Taylor appeared like a woman who had been previously in good health. She was rather above the ordinary size, good-looking, well-formed, and altogether, according to Dr. Paterson's judgment, a superior looking person at her time of life. She did not show any indication of being an inebriate. Her face was pale and her skin covered with a clammy perspiration. The predominant symptoms pointed to the influence of some powerful narcotic. She was evidently dying. Her head and shoulders being slightly elevated she showed some signs of recovered consciousness, and Dr. Pritchard slapped the old lady on the shoulder saying: "You are getting better, darling?" While attending to Mrs. Taylor's case, Dr. Paterson observed Mrs. Pritchard very carefully. It appeared to him that she must be suffering from the depressing influence of antimony. Her features were sharp and thin, and there was a hectic flush on her cheeks. Her voice was weak and peculiar—resembling that of a person verging into the collapse state of cholera. In spite of Dr. Pritchard's statement that his wife was suffering from gastric fever, Dr. Paterson could not get rid of the conviction that she was being poisoned by antimony. The next day Mr. Taylor, who had been summoned from Edinburgh, called at Dr. Paterson's for a certificate, Mrs. Taylor having died during the previous night. The doctor refused a certificate, and upon being applied to therefor by the registrar on the 3d of March he refused again, accompanying his refusal with a note which was intended to open that officer's eyes. He wrote that he was surprised at being called upon to certify the cause of death in this case. He only saw the patient for a few minutes before her death. Dr. Pritchard might certify the cause. The death, he said, was certainly sudden, unexpected, and to him mysterious.

While Mary Paterson and the washer-woman

acre dressing MRS. TAYLOR'S body they found in the pocket of her dress a bottle of Buttley's Solution, which MARY PATERSON put under the drawers. Afterward PITCHARD came in and said that he wanted to see the bottle which MARY M'LEOD said had been found. Upon looking at it he exclaimed, "Good Heavens, has she taken all that since Tuesday?" He added that MRS. TAYLOR ought not to have got a girl like that (meaning M'LEOD) to buy it for her—she ought to have told him. He would buy it for her—the nothing of the matter, as it might lead him into trouble.

MRS. TAYLOR having been disposed of, Doctor PITCHARD devoted himself with renewed ardor to his remaining case. It is wonderful that the uniformity with which MRS. PITCHARD'S fits of violent sickness followed upon her meals aroused no suspicion as to the real cause of her difficulty. This is especially remarkable, because the two separate instances a peculiar taste was discovered in the very first servants. A piece of cheese, intended for MRS. PITCHARD'S supper, was tasted by MARY M'LEOD, and the latter experienced a peculiar burning sensation in the throat, which was followed by thirst. On another occasion MARY PATERSON the cook tasted of some egg-flip, which the Doctor had prepared for his wife, and which caused vomiting and violent sickness.

DR. PATERSON'S conduct in the matter was very reprehensible. He was called to visit MRS. PITCHARD one week after MRS. TAYLOR'S death. He found her weak and prostrate; but in her feeble voice she accounted her satisfactory car greatly to date at his visit. Then, in a very earnest manner, she asked him if he had really thought her mother was dying when he saw her. "Most decidedly," he said; and he had told Dr. PITCHARD so. She then clasped her hands, looked up, and fervently exclaimed, "Good God, is it possible!" and burst into a flood of tears. DR. PATERSON entered into conversation with her regarding her mother's peculiar state of health. MRS. PITCHARD said that her mother's health was generally good, but she suffered occasionally from neuralgic headaches. To believe which she had recourse to Buttley's Sedative Solution (of opium). In regard to her own self she told Dr. PATERSON that, for some time past, she had suffered very much from sickness, retching, and vomiting, with severe pains in the stomach and through the back, accompanied with flatulency, great heat, and uneasiness about the mouth and throat, and a constant, urgent thirst. The Doctor examined her tongue, which was very foul and of a light-brown color. Her face was more deeply flushed than before he saw her, and her pulse was weak and rapid, and her skin moist and cold. All these symptoms confirmed DR. PATERSON'S opinion that she was dying slowly poisoned. But what did he do to relieve her? He prescribed Champagne and brandy to recruit the strength, but said not one word to take one step to prevent the continuance of the poisoning. He also prescribed small pieces of ice to relieve thirst, and, when she tired of that, citrate of magnesia. As for the ice, it was to have had reference to nutriment chiefly, prescribing soup, arrow-root, etc.

It was the next day after this interview that DR. PATERSON refused to give the Registrar a certificate of the cause of MRS. TAYLOR'S death. He thought that would be a sufficient hint to the authorities, and would also frighten the murderer from his purpose. That he had succeeded in frightening DR. PITCHARD seemed quite evident to him; for on March 9 the latter called on him and pronounced his wife out of danger under his treatment, although some weakness and irritability remained. This statement of PITCHARD'S was a direct falsehood, as the sufferer's woman was grossly neglected. But DR. PATERSON had spoken right out he would have saved MRS. PITCHARD'S life. Doubtless, if he had been as certain in MRS. TAYLOR'S case as he was in MRS. PITCHARD'S, he would have been bolder, for then he would have been confident that a post-mortem examination in the former case would confirm his statements. But not sure of being thus confirmed he did not feel safe in expressing his opinions openly. He desired suspicion to fall upon DR. PITCHARD, but did not dare himself to make the first movement in that direction.

But the time was at hand when the fact of MRS. PITCHARD'S death would lead the way for a detection of the murder. On the 13th of March DR. PATERSON was called to MRS. PITCHARD for the last time. That lady was then on the verge of death. She recognized the Doctor with a faint smile. The Doctor was struck with her terribly altered appearance since he left her. She could only speak in muttering tones, and these had a wild expression. Her pulse was weaker and more rapid—her tongue of a darker brown. The Doctor prescribed medicine to bring on sleep.

PITCHARD had, a few hours after, the pleasure of seeing his wish, at which he had labored for five months, finally accomplished. He and MARY M'LEOD were with the poor woman until she died. When she breathed her last he was with his wife. He cried over her dead body, exclaiming that she was not dead, and calling upon her to come back to her dear husband. As MARY M'LEOD states, she took, entered the room he asked her to bring a rifle and shoot him. The following entry is found in his diary of that date:

"—11, Friday.—Died here at 1 A.M. Mary Jane, my own beloved wife, aged 33 years: no tetanus surrounded her bedside, but like a calm, peaceful lamb she died. Minute away. Prayer on prayer till nine o'clock, everlasting love. Save me, Lord, for Thy dear Son."

When the body was taken to Edinburgh he was so anxious to look again upon the features of his "own beloved wife" that he had the coffin reopened, and fervently kissed her dead face, which he had been torturing with convulsion and pinching with poison for weeks.

An anonymous letter was soon received by the authorities which led to an investigation. The bodies of both MRS. TAYLOR and MRS. PITCHARD were examined. In both cases it was found that every organ connected with the digestive and digestive systems betrayed the presence of antimony. Upon an examination of the bottle of Buttley's Solution discovered on MRS. TAYLOR'S person after death it was found to contain antimony mingled with aconite. These circumstances led to the arrest of PITCHARD, who was committed to the Glasgow prison, from which he was taken for trial on the 3d of July.

The trial of PITCHARD extended over five days. Before his trial he had made two separate declarations, one on the 23d of March and the other on the 31st of April. In the first of these he denied having given his wife any antimony, but with the intention of making her death appear suicidal he stated that previous to her visit to Edinburgh he had given her a bottle of antimony for outward application, she having troubled him with the glands of the neck. In the second he denied that he was in any way accessory to MRS. TAYLOR'S death, and that he believed she died from paralysis and apoplexy. The principal witnesses on the trial were the servants of PITCHARD'S household, of whom the most prominent was MARY M'LEOD, and the doctors who attended upon MRS. TAYLOR and MRS. PITCHARD. Nearly all the facts elicited by the trial have been given in this narrative. But it is important to dwell more particularly upon the testimony given by the girl M'LEOD.

MARY M'LEOD, when she went to service at PITCHARD'S, was not yet fifteen years old. In the course of the investigation DR. PATTEY, who examined her with great familiarity. She became with child by him, and the Doctor procured a miscarriage. After MRS. PITCHARD saw him kiss her in one of the bedrooms, and the girl told her mistress that she would leave, but the latter would not permit her to go away. After this time the improper intimacy was continued, and PITCHARD promised MARY that if his wife died before him he would marry her. He had got the better of her by means of presenting her with jewelry; he gave her his photograph a few days before MRS. PITCHARD died. MARY M'LEOD'S testimony was given with great hesitation and reluctance.

The argument for the defense was almost entirely negative. The chief stress was laid on the absence of any motive sufficient for the commission of the crime. The jury were unanimous in their verdict against the prisoner, who was sentenced to be hung on the 28th of July.

After the sentence had been passed PITCHARD confessed to the murder of his wife and to criminal intimacy with the girl M'LEOD. He declared that it was in any way instrumental in MRS. TAYLOR'S death. He denied having in any way administered antimony to his wife by drugs during her long illness, but says that at the last he administered chloroform to her at her request, and under the influence of partial insensibility. He refused to give her enough to cause death. He added that since his acquaintance with M'LEOD he had been under the influence of liquor.

The most curious feature of the murders is that no more adequate motive can be alleged for their commission. This is the more remarkable, as it is that DR. PITCHARD was gentle in manner, a man who was somewhat popular, and who was not addictive to ironrant girls. The real motive appears to have been his desire to get possession of a legacy of two thousand pounds bequeathed to MRS. TAYLOR, and which he knew would be inherited by his wife on such conditions as to insure his own possession in case of the death of his wife. This supposition is confirmed by the fact that summary means were taken to rapidly dispose of MRS. TAYLOR, while the decease of the latter was allowed to be wept unto the mother's death. PITCHARD was embarrassed by debt, which would add to the temptation; and the fact that he had insured the life of the latter for nine months before his wife, after seeking than avoiding her presence, shows how little hesitation he felt as to such a murder. The supposition that he committed the murders in order to marry M'LEOD is untenable, for neither his wife nor her mother knew or were an obstacle to their intercourse. Indeed in his confession PITCHARD says that his wife was aware of their intercourse, and that she had forgiven it from the eyes of the world. This fact only aggravates the horror of his crime. The remarkable features which appear in connection with the present day occurrence is the intellectual cruelty of the murderer, the marvelous coldness of heart which could induce him to poison his victims when they

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IX.—No. 451.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 19, 1865. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE NAVAL APPRENTICE SYSTEM.

As the navy will in future constitute the strong arm of our military power, it is of the first importance that the system for training its seamen should be as perfect as possible. It is not enough that we have at Annapolis an excellent school of instruction even under Admiral PORTER'S supervision. Our best men in the army and navy are usually those who have developed their efficiency rather in the practice than in the merely theoretical study of their profession.

The need of a naval apprentice system, which had been on trial in our service, and failed, owing to a variety of causes, made itself apparent at the commencement of the rebellion. The scarcity of naval seamen, men who were conversant with the routine and duties of men-of-war, gave the department much anxiety, and caused considerable delay in fitting out vessels for the pressing and important demands of that time. It is true the Government has for many years been paying large bounties to fishermen off our northeastern coast; but experience has already proved that these fishermen, though the best material out of which a navy can be made, are not always ready to respond to the calls which may be made upon their services. England has her apprentice system; but in this country it has met with but little approval.

Our apprentice system was formally inaugurated by an act of Congress, dated March 2, 1837, but after many disappointments it was abandoned in 1849, and was not revived until 1864. In May of last year the Sabine was ordered to be put in commission as a practice and school ship for naval apprentices, under the command of Lieutenant-Commander R. B. LOWRY, United States Navy, who was specially selected by the Navy Department for the very important and arduous duty of organizing and establishing on a firm basis the nucleus from which the future rank and file of the navy was to emanate, and in such a form as not only to be reliable at all times, but of a character which would place our vessels upon an equal, if not make them superior to those of any naval power. Owing to the piratical visit of the Tallahassee and other rebel craft the Sabine was sent to the eastern coast to protect our commerce and fishing interests, and her services were considered so valuable in that section the people of Portland induced the Navy Department to retain her at that port until the danger which threatened them was past; so that it was not until October, 1864, that Commander LOWRY was enabled to fairly enter upon the organization of this important system. During her stay, however, about one hundred and thirty boys were enlisted as apprentices.

The first boy enlisted as a naval apprentice under the new organization, was E. CORLEDGE HARRINGTON, of Roxbury, Massachusetts, aged fifteen years and six months. He is now on board, and is one of the most promising boys in the ship. There are now over two hundred boys on board the Sabine. The conditions of enlistment are strict as to character, and it is required that the age be not under fourteen nor over eighteen. At fourteen they must measure not less than four feet eight inches in height, and twenty-seven inches around the chest; at fifteen years their height must be four feet ten inches, and twenty-nine inches around the chest. Each candidate must be able to read, write, and spell; be free from physical disabilities, well-grown, healthy, active, and exhibit an aptitude for the ocean and the duties of sea-life.

After passing the examination before the surgeon and instructors, the paymaster furnishes the apprentice for immediate use with the following articles of clothing: One pea-jacket, cloth cap, pair of cloth trousers, flannel over and under shirts, pair of drawers, shoes, neck-tie, socks, white duck pants and frock, comb, knife, pot, pan, and spoon, one bar soap, clothes-bag, and a badge. The boy is then taken to the ship's corporal, who assists him in the transformation from a landsman to a sailor-boy. Next the sailmaker furnishes him with a hammock—his bed until of age. Then the master-at-arms places him in a mess, and, at the same time, gives him a printed form, on which is registered his number, that of his bag and hammock, a list of his clothing, and points out the place where he is to swing his hammock. Each boy has a number given to him when he enlists, and he retains that number as long as he is an apprentice.

A tailor is allowed for every hundred boys. They have also their shoemaker, and on the starboard side of the vessel there is a barber-shop and a bath-room. The Rev. Mr. Salter is chaplain of the ship, and divine services are held every Sabbath. There is belonging to the ship an excellent library of about 1000 volumes judiciously selected.

Some of the prominent features of the boys' life on board ship we illustrate on pages 520 and 521. Let us take a single day's experience on board as an example of the workings of the system.

At daylight all the apprentices are turned out of their hammocks, and these are stored in the ratlings. The decks are washed down, and at 7 o'clock the boys are sent over the mast-head to familiarize them with that duty. At 7.30 breakfast is served: twenty minutes are allowed for the meal. At 8 o'clock all hands are ready to begin the exercises of the day. At 9.00 all hands go to muster for inspection, after which the usual exercises are carried on till past 10. At 11 o'clock drill ceases, and at noon is served out. At 1 o'clock the boys are again sent over the mast-heads. This occupies about a quarter of an hour in all the details. At 2 to 3 school begins and is dismissed at 4.20. At 5 supper is served; at 6 the boys again run over the mast-heads. From 6.30 to 7 they are exercised in boating, battalion drills, on in reefing, furling, and loosing sail. After these exercises, recreation is indulged in. At 8 the signal is given to return to their hammocks, and at 9.30 P.M. "silence" is ordered.

In the routine exercises the boys are taught to handle yards and sails, to use the lead and compass, they are drilled in artillery and sword and rifle practice, and in common English branches of a school education. The naval restraints are only so stringent as is necessary to preserve good character and discipline. No tobacco or spirits are allowed, and the greatest stress is laid upon cleanliness. The effect furnished the boys is of the best quality and sufficient in quantity.

Occasional cruises at sea give variety to the life, and increase the interest of all; and become a certain number, varying to the rate of the vessel, will be sent out on all our cruises. In this way these apprentices will be at once ingrafted into regular man-of-war life, and establish a demand for their services. Already one hundred and eighteen have been sent out and are reported as valuable acquisition to the ships upon which they have been placed. The department requires some three or four thousand such apprentices, and is making arrangements for their introduction into the navy.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 19, 1865.

THE GREAT STRUGGLE.

When Governor Holden, Provisional Governor of the United States for the State of North Carolina, says that he does not think Union men will be "punished" in that State, what does such an extraordinary expression mean? When the Northern allies of the late rebels declare that, having laid down their arms, every State lately in rebellion has as good a right to send representatives to Congress without condition or inquiry as the loyal States—what do they mean? What does the total absence in the debate of States of any disposition but that of sullen acquiescence signify?

All such things mean simply that the great struggle has merely changed its form, not its essence. It is a contest between the spirit of equal rights and of privilege. The form is a struggle between Nationality and State Sovereignty; and this question is not yet settled. The people of the United States have to meet this year exactly the same spirit that they met last year. They have to fight it now as earnestly as they fought it then. The field only, not the fight, has changed.

Meanwhile we are glad to record the great advantages which the people and the loyal popular government have gained over the enemy. In a struggle which is in its very nature long and fluctuating it is cheering to see always the point of such positive progress as we have now attained. All we ask is that in our exultation we do not recede: that we do not misconceive the real nature of our advantages and fatally assume it to be a final victory.

The doctrine of State Sovereignty, which would be the prostration of the United States, of civil liberty, and of civilization, has been for thirty years and more aiming to engross the Government. It has had more able and astute politicians and a more stupid and superstitious following than any other policy in our history. The ingenuity and persistence with which this dogma of State Sovereignty attacked and undermined to destroy the fundamental principles of the National Government give our political history its profoundest interest. This dogma was pure reaction. It was the protest of aristocracy and the Middle Ages against democracy and a new era. And the struggle was so skillfully conducted that at length the peaceable overthrow of the Union seemed to be a foregone conclusion.

The State Sovereignty leaders, making the discussion of slavery their excuse, felt themselves strong enough in 1860 to force a conclusion. They were sure they could do one of two things: they could either terrify the demoralized country into submission to their terms—by withdrawing from the Union they could compel reconstruction upon their own conditions. By all apparent logic they were right. The condition of the country seemed to justify their conclusion. The doom of the Union was sealed in the estimation of the shrewdest observers.

But great criminals never allow for moral causes. Accustomed to believe men to be governed by the basest selfishness, they found all their calculations upon meanness and cowardice and habit, forgetting those extraordinary impulses which are to nations what the inspirations of mortal peril are to individuals. Counting only upon the selfishness of a controlling majority of the country as it had been revealed in the conduct of such men as Isaac Toucey, James Buchanan, Charles Pinckney Sumner, Lewis Cass, and Jefferson Davis, and upon the Woods, with the party of which they were leaders, and the Pierces, with the party of the same party—relying further and confidently upon the position taken by the New York Tribune, the recognized organ of the radical section of the Republican party, that the Union alone opposition was to be feared, and upon the plain terror of the conservative section of the Republicans, represented by the New York Herald and Journal, the State Sovereignty leaders were perfectly sure of their success, and with appalling rapidity. Drunk and defiant they fired. The shot scattered the dead which had obscured the heart of the nation from itself and from the world. It saw in the flash of the gun all the fearful consequences of treason. It felt such a lifting of noble emotion as this generation had not known. The unexpected and incalculable force of common sympathy with the rebellious regicide to the villagers in the savage skirmish in the Connecticut Valley, and led a nation to victory.

The State Sovereignty leaders made a fearful mistake, and they now see it. They now see that they foolishly abandoned the method by which alone they could have succeeded. And what do they now propose? To return to that method; to continue the effort; to retrieve the disasters of battle by the force of the ballot box and raging with the same fury abroad, if they can, to enter Congress "stanch and true Southern men," and to resume the work within the Union which they attempted in 1860–61 in their attempt to break out of it.

That they are in the least degree in political opinion nobody is fool-hardy enough to contend. They are only saved by the total failure of the war. That they are weakened is true; but their prestige at home is not lost, and a large part in the country is ready to help them to it in their policy as they agree with them in political views. And the exact point of danger is this: Reconstruction will give to the unconstitutional representation of the eleven rebel States in the year 1870 an increase of nineteen members. Let these be elected by the late rebels in those States, and they will control the twenty-eight members from the rest of the country to place the Government of the United States in the hands of the Democratic party. The House of New York alone could supply those members.

This is a very plain and simple purpose. The long training and cherished tradition of an ignorant people whose passions are inflamed by skillful and designing leaders are not extinguished in one unsuccessful struggle. The American people suppose the question to be ended because Lee surrendered to Grant at Appomattox Court House is as wise as the Englishman who should have supposed the civil war in England ended by the execution of Charles II. We have reached a certain period in the struggle—that is all. It ascends from the battle-field to the ballot-box; but it is the same combat and of the same scope. And what we beg thoughtful men to remember is, that what was gained in the field is lost in the ballot-box. The men who could not shoot us down may wheedle and fatigue and outwit us into submission.

This sunshine twaddle about conciliation is therefore either folly or knavery. It is folly if it springs from a conviction that the Government is in any peril from its own enemies. It is knavery if it be merely a renewal of the old tactics. When the intentions of "the South" —speaking politically—were the blackest, we heard the most of these soothing words for the rights and of the Northern exasperation of our Southern brethren. We were exhorted to forbearance, to conciliation, to magnanimity, and while we were taught to relax our hands they clutched our throats. Is it wise to be twice snared in the same trap?

Conciliation we have no wish to sneer or exult—certainly none to misrepresent. But as we believe much of the guilt of the war rests upon those who prevaricated and equivocated instead of speaking plainly, we hope to avoid any similar responsibility in the future. This paper circulates weekly in the loyal States, and is read by many who do not love the Government or the Union. We say to them frankly that the people of the country have, in our judgment, paid too costly a price for their victory to surrender it easily. We believe it will be found that Congress, frankly representing them, is resolved that no State shall be reorganized except upon conditions which promise peace by intrusting the political power, according to the principle of our Government, to the loyal and national population. To confirm this purpose is our aim. We are for the Union and Government of the United States. We supported them against the arms of their enemies in war. We shall support them against the wiles of their enemies in peace. We have no wish to conciliate those enemies. We hope to conquer them fairly and forever, whether at the cannon's mouth or the ballot-box.

WHAT WE OWE.

Grim Mr. Vandyke sits in his luxurious room in the marble building on the corner of Wall and Nassau Streets at the leaders whom he sees through his plate-glass windows eagerly "shinning" for money at seven per cent. at mid-day, under a blazing sun and in a temperature of 92° in the shade. For Mr. Vandyke is the man who goes to bed with as idle balance of nearly forty millions in greenbacks—because as much as is held by all the banks in New York put together. If you should say to Mr. Vandyke, "Good Mr. Vandyke, why pile up so much money uselessly in your Treasury? Why not let it rest where it was, in places where it could be loaned to people who borrow, until you want it, or, at all events, until the dog-days are past, and you can run about without danger of sun-stroke?" that grim functionary would overwhelm you on the spot in a torrent of figures, of the amount in round numbers of money placed to the credit of disbursing officers, of the sum due for interest on Seven-Thirty Treasury notes, of the million of debtcertificates which mature every day in these times; and at the end would almost convince you that, instead of being the modern Midas, who coined all he had touched, he is in fact the Great-Pauper of the age.

And it is well he has so good a case to show. For, as the people have looked on through Mr. Secretary M'Culloch and his familiar, the grim Vandyke, had once more undertaken to regulate prices after the Chase method. For some time after the enormous increase in the subtreasury at this point mysterious rumors had been afloat touching an intended raid by the Government upon the fortunate class of men known as gold-gamblers. It was known that Government was selling gold—wisely or unwisely; and it was noticed that as soon as the Government withdrew from the market the price usually advanced. In April, 1864, a few millions of gold sold by Government caused a stringency in gold; 1865, sales of larger amounts neither reduced the value of gold nor enhanced the price of money. When, therefore, it was known that large consignments of Government gold did not seem to check the demand, and that immediately after these sales the Sub-treasury at this point began to call in the millions which banks many days and even weeks before the money was needed, the inference was natural that it was the purpose of the Treasury Department to try to reduce the premium by tightening the money market, and so embarrassing speculators who were carrying gold on margins.

The scheme—if any such scheme there were —was defeated, as any well-informed person must have foreseen at the outset, by the instant withdrawal of the gold-gamblers securities. These are in the hands of individuals and corporations in this country not less than $825,000,000 of Seven-Thirty notes. A large proportion of these are held as investments, and are best known as carried by banks on small margins. Another large amount was paid out in the first two weeks of July, 1865, on the condition that in August they should be held out of the market for four months. Mr. Vandyke's accumulation of money was thus increased in time with the expiration of the four months; and these notes coming into the market for sale just at a time when needy banks were realizing on the like security at 1 per cent. and 1½ per cent. in a few days and would have fallen very much more, if Mr. Jay Cooke's friends had not stepped forward to their relief in behalf of their own interests, and induced Mr. Vandyke to disgorge some of his idle greenbacks.

A popular impression now prevails that peace has been secured throughout this country. If this impression be well founded there can be no good reason for persisting in methods of finance which, though temporarily required by success in the agony of the war, are clearly at variance with sound economy. It is clearly no part of the business of Government of the Treasury to regulate prices—even the price of gold. Gold is at a premium because there are $684,000,000 of legal tenders, $165,000,000 of national bank-notes (practically a legal tender), and $120,000,000 of State bank-notes in circulation as money—in all $969,000,000 of paper-money; and because the Treasury daily is issuing, even now, nearly a million of dollars each working day, more paper-money, in national bank-notes and compound legal tenders. So long as those issues continue, gold will stay at a premium, and will rather rise than fall, and sinful efforts to bring down the premium by tampering with the money market or selling odd lots of gold will only aggravate the case. When the time comes at which the receipts of the Treasury Department are greater than its wants, the currency may be retired, canceled, or funded, and then the premium of gold will fall in spite of all the speculators in Christendom. Till then, would it not be best for the Secretary of the Treasury to let the Bears in gold take care of the Bulls, and rule never?

The Treasury statement of 1st August is quite satisfactory—more so, in general, than was expected. The increase in the public debt since 1st June was $124,647,524—about $2,000,000 a day. The total debt on 1st August was $2,757,253,276. The following table will show the principal items:

Plain legal tenders.....	$433,160,589
Temporary legal tenders.....	321,078,760
Twenty year 6 per cents, interest in coin....	187,315,000
Twenty-Five 6 per cents, interest in coin....	616,259,850
Ten-Forties 5 per cents, interest in coin....	117,750,000
Seven-Thirty notes, interest in currency.....	830,640,000
Compound 6 per cents.....	98,780,000

Besides the above, Government owes about $99,000,000 to the banks, who can demand payment of the whole sum on call after ten days' notice. Sound finances require that this indebtedness, on the ground that it exposes the Government to be placed in a position of embarrassment whenever, through the vicissitudes of trade, the banks become straitened and acquire money. If, for instance, just now, the banks chose to call upon the Treasury for repayment of this sum, as they have the legal right to do, the call could not be met, and the Treasury would go to protest. Of course there is little likelihood of any thing of the kind. The banks are as deeply interested in maintaining the credit of the Government as Mr. M'Culloch himself. But now that the war is over, and we should be glad to establish a dollar for a sound, safe, peace-administration of the finances, these temporary loans involve a danger to which Government ought not to be unexposed.

The interest charge on the public debt on the 1st of July was just $149,269,497, of which $64,521,837 was payable in coin, and $74,740,630 in currency This is probably quite as large as, if not larger than, the average interest charge that will be a few years hence. For though, when all the legal tenders and fractional currency are funded, and the excess of expenditure over income this year and next is added to the funded debt, a sum of probably $700,000,000 will have to be added to the interest bearing debt, and a sum of not less than $40,000,000 to the interest charge, swelling it to $190,000,000; yet still, as soon as we begin to see daylight in our finances, national bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest will not be worth par, and within a few years the Seven-Thirties, Ten-Forties, Five-Twenties, etc., will be exchanged for such bonds. After per cent. annual interest charge on a debt of $3,400,000,000 would only be $136,000,000, say $5 20 per head on a population of 30,000,000, which is not more than is now the people of the British Islands pay at present.

People generally, do not seem to agree with Mr. Abbott that the national debt is a blessing. Indeed the argument that, if it is a blessing, the more of it the better, is a pretty conclusive reductio ad absurdum. The act of prosperity in reducing the debt has been so admirably described in the history of Colonel Rawdon Crawley that there seems nothing to be added to the description. His prospered certainly; but poor Raggles was "ruinged." Now this country does not mean to "ruing" its Raggles. We propose to pay our debts in full, to the dollar, principal and interest. But to do this we must have sound and careful management of the finances at Washington, and some decent attention to the elementary principles of political economy.

THE ENGLISH ELECTIONS.

The English elections are over. The Liberal party has gained several members of Parliament, and Lord Palmerston for City rule has been engaged in showing that it is not much of a shower after all. But if those members had been returned on the ground by Mr. Disraeli, the clever Mr. Disraeli would have considered it a signal Tory triumph. Mr. Disraeli's political career has been a mistake.

His present mistake is remarkable. The English election, held in a time of profound peace, was distinguished for more rioting and bloodshed of violent character than one election in that of an engrossing civil war. At Sheffield, Chippenham, Carlisle, Cheltenham, Nottingham, and elsewhere, the disturbances were very serious. The mobs were especially "ruffianly." Large quantities of property were destroyed, people were beaten, and lives were lost. In many places the candidates were prevented from speaking. "Does it become us to sneer at America?" asks the London Star.

Four thirds of the Liberal members in the English elections springs from our sympathy with the great Liberal party, and from the probability of the feeling of the new Government toward this country. The old party lines are much obliterated at present in England. The political leaders, excepting John Bright and his especial school, seem to be divided into Conservative Liberals and Liberal Conservatives. The chief purpose of political action is, apparently, to maintain the status quo. That one of the points made by Mr. Disraeli against Mr. Gladstone, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was that when the Tories were in power in 1858–9 the expenses of the year were under £55,000,000; while under the Liberals, in 1864–5, they were more than £66,000,000. To this MR. GLADSTONE was greatly applauded for replying that the Tories were really spending at the rate of £69,000,000, and that the subsequent increase was owing to plans already undertaken by the Tories. Such a contest was not, in itself, very radical.

The result of the election shows the political sentiment of England to be favorable to moderate liberalism. It has not declared for any distinctive policy. The "rest and be thankful" of Earl ROSSELL. Lord PALMERSTON is not the name of a policy; and his ignoble drifting as a mere cleverly distrusted by the most earnest Liberals as it is politically opposed by the stubbornest Tories. The election, however, places some truly able and dignified members, like JOHN STUART MILL, in Parliament, and retains others like MR. GLADSTONE.

Measured by any standard JOHN STUART MILL is one of the greatest of living Englishmen. Whether as thinker, scholar, or practical man he has no superior. He was chosen for a London district, Westminster, against the most resolute opposition and the most profuse outlay of money, he is a vindication of the value of plain principles in a political contest. "A strong effort is being made," said MR. MILL in his speech on the eve of the election, "to bring in a Tory candidate by an expenditure of money more profuse than of a Tory ever attempted in this city." He said the success of such an effort would be degrading to the constituency. And if he himself were elected, or if he proved to be a failure, the constituency would have triumphed over mere money. He was elected, and they did triumph; while MR. MILL'S record of strict economy, of joy for his election, and of perfect honesty in dealing with the electors, will be of the greatest service to the good cause both in England and America.

MR. GLADSTONE is released by the election from the coils of Oxford necessity, and might now, if he will, resign his position and become, become the leader of England. But he has, with all his sagacity, conviction, and accomplishment, a certain timidity and fastidiousness which have perpetually restrained his freedom. The tie with Oxford has been, of late, his highmarch sympathy and his known scholarship. But his last year's speech upon the franchise showed how radically his political views differed from those of his constituency. In that speech he virtually took the ground of universal suffrage. There was a Tory cry of horror and a Liberal shout of surprise and pleasure. He was obliged to explain, partially explained away. The shock, however, has severed his connection with Oxford, which has lasted for eighteen years, and he is now returned for South Lancashire, with two Conservative colleagues.

If his hesitation in holding firmly to his ground upon the suffrage had proceeded wholly from his official relation to Oxford we might pardon MR. GLADSTONE to ascend at once to a position like that of CANNING and SIR ROBERT PEEL. But with all his great statesmanlike and intellectual qualities he has an undoubted infirmity of temperament which will hold him in check. A man of steener stuff, some COBDEN or BRIGHT, is required to direct the crisis which slowly approaches in England. To popularize her system without too fierce a shock is the positive work of her statesmen. The Palmerstonian era of negation and inaction is passing away. There comes a time when shirking will be impossible. For that time men like JOHN STUART MILL prepare the minds, and men like the late RICHARD COBDEN guide the hands, of their countrymen.

HENRY WERTZ.

THE trial of WERTZ renews the public interest in that most harrowing and ghastly chapter of the war, the history of Union prisoners of Spen at Andersonville. But does the mind and heart of this country yet fully comprehend that incredible and unnatural crime, by comparison with which the Black Hole at Calcutta, the Armory prison ship, the Dartmoor prison, and every historical cruelty is ridiculous?

The trial at Washington was made Commissary-General of all Union prisoners. His son was sent to Andersonville to prepare a pen for the reception of thirty thousand. He chose a spot upon a slightly sloping hill-side of eighteen acres, afterward enlarged to twenty-seven. It was in a thickly wooded region, about nine miles from Americus, the county town of Sumter County, Georgia. A gentleman, who lives at the county town, and who tells us the story, having been taken through Andersonville on seeing Captain WERTZ laying out the ground, asked if any shelter were to be provided. He was laughed at. "Then, had you not better leave some of the trees standing in the inclosure?" The Captain replied that he "was going to make a pen for the d—d Yankees, where they would not faster than they could be sent there."

He kept his word. He stripped the slope, at the bottom of which a stagnant stream five inches deep crept lazily through a fen. He surrounded it with a stockade eighteen feet high, with an outer gallery for the guard. Into this place, the Union soldiers were turned, stripped of every thing valuable, even to their blankets; and there, in the heat and cold and storm, exposed equally by night and day, they sickened, they starved, they rotted, they stormed into madness or sank into idiocy, moaning, shouting, laughing wildly, groaning, panting, happily dying—thirty-seven thousand human beings at one time—and fifteen thousand of the whole number confined were taken out and laid under the ground but not buried. The loathsome stench of this living death infected the air for three miles around. People moved away to avoid the pestilence. They could not sell their money to buy food. The prison rations were but a form. The only water was the stagnant stream, on which floated human excrement. If by any chance some inmate received extra food, as a charitable gift from some friend like our informant, it was snatched from his hands and devoured by his companions maddened into wild beasts!

The hospitals, like the rations, were a form only. Our informant was permitted to visit one patient. He picked his way with difficulty through the filth of the cabin toward the spot where the poor creature lay. The foulness of the air was dreadful. The visitor was sickened and retched. He found the victim lying in a shirt black as it could be. His trousers were stripped away to the knee. He had no shoes. A strip of blanket lay across his middle. His disease was the common army form of chronic diarrhœa; and his body, from the waist of all around him, was rolling himself two or three feet from where he lay and then rolling back again; he and all those nets literally lying in their own filth, and the shanty reeking with the foulest fumes.

In the winter some of the prisoners were sent into neighboring woods in squads under guard to pick up what stray wood they could find. If they overstead the hour allotted them, they were tried by drum-head court-martial and hung. But there are marks of the most brutal treatment of our prisoners too horrible to be told.

Of this pen HENRY WERTZ was keeper. Witness was examined at length. The defense was adjutant. His nephew was commissary and aulter. But the turnkey, the man who immediately had charge of the prisoners of anguish, despair, and death, was HENRY WERTZ. When KILPATRICK was known to be scouring the country with the hope of reaching Andersonville and releasing the prisoners, there was a panic among the rebel officers at the pen. WERTZ posted his batteries upon heights commanding the approaches from the north and west direction; and HENRY WERTZ declared to the prisoners that when KILPATRICK came within seven miles of the stockade he would massacre them all. Not an emotion of pity, regret, or doubt seems to have touched the hearts of the WIRZ-DEAN or of WERTZ. They were the willing and delighted agents of a policy of which the mere conception curdles the heart, and which fiends only could have executed. It was a policy known to Jefferson DAVIS and Robert E. LEE. Before God these two men are responsible for the crimes of Andersonville, as upon our side ABRAHAM LINCOLN and General GRANT would have been responsible had they suffered such a pen to exist within our lines and such torture to be inflicted after the least rumor of them had reached their ears.

And for this incalculable offense HENRY WERTZ is to be tried. Of his guilt there is no doubt, unless he deems it a question whether keeping an Andersonville prison and whether he were the keeper—points which are not denied. His counsel beg the press not to prejudge him. They grant his guilt, but they ask that he be tried at Andersonville. HENRY WERTZ consented to be the agent. How can such an agent be prejudged?

If any man would know the rebellion, its spirit, its method, its honor, its chivalry, its heroism—if he would truly understand the character of that caste which has long governed the plain people of this country and the world as "high-toned," "gentlemanly," and "proud" of it—he would comprehend it in the fact that it sules the rights of men and women under any pretext whatever—let him carefully ponder the revelations which will be made in the trial of HENRY WERTZ. May God have mercy upon his soul!

BLOWN FROM GUNS.

AN Englishwoman sends us from Manchester, in England, an indignant note complaining of the injustice done the English people by our publications in the statement that the blowing of Sepoys from guns by the British troops. "Allow me to say," she writes, "that you know these men who were blown from the mouths of the cannon at Peshawar had been guilty of every crime that human beings are capable of." "MR. DAVIS," she continues, "is a gentleman, and of your country," and has not committed, she adds, nor caused his soldiers to commit the crimes for which the Indian Princes suffered. Our correspondent refers to copious extracts from MR. TREVELYAN'S "Cawnpore," that we may see exactly what those crimes were.

We do not forget the enormities of which we were already fully aware. They were revolting, shocking, indescribable. We are also aware that while Parliament censured the act, it was not disapproved by the indignation of the British people, who felt that a stern and summary justice had been inflicted upon atrocious offenders. We are still farther aware, as an "Englishwoman" intimates, that the sufferers were not the contemporary of those who punished them, but that the avengers were strangers who had subdued by the sharp sword and by monstrous crimes the country of those whom they punished: that they were in the amplest sense invaders, and had exposed themselves to the vengeance of barbaric people, which in its outbreak was as horrible to us as it is to the angry English subject.

But will the Englishwoman "allow us to say" that the revelations of the Cawnpore crimes in MR. TREVELYAN'S book, pitiful as they are, are not more terrible than the ghastly horrors of Andersonville, of Millen, of Salisbury, of Belle Isle—which letter spot the "gentleman" DAVIS could see from his window; and that the atrocities committed by his soldiers with his permission, of deliberate intention and in his personal knowledge, not upon a few women of another country, but upon tens of thousands of his innocent countrymen, pleading upon their own rightful soil, were such as the tongue refuses to utter, or the pen to write.

And when the Englishwoman and English men presume to affect horror that the "gentleman" DAVIS should be solemnly and lawfully punished for such crimes, we shall continue to remind them that they are protesting against the legal trial in this country of greater barbarians than they summarily blew from the mouths of cannon in India.

We have no wish to quarrel with English women or English men. We have no wish to discriminate between them. Whatever is just, reasonable in English institutions, noble in English character, lofty and heroic in English achievement, earnest and humane in English effort, we cordially admire. We love Englishmen themselves. But they must learn that we do not believe them to be wiser nor better nor stronger than we. The follies and the crimes of their history are plainly written in our mother tongue, and we know the English infinitely better than they know us. Do they seriously think that they have assumed any right to advise the people of the United States in the adjustment of their civil difficulties? Do they suppose we are not aware that they have not forgiven our success?

LITERARY.

THE Story of the Great March," from the Diary of a Staff Officer, by Brevet Major GEORGE WARD NICHOLS, Aid-de-camp to General SHERMAN, with a MAP and Illustrations, is just published by HARPER & BROTHERS. The title felicitously describes this animated and entertaining work. It is truly a story, and the Major has spared us all bewildering display of technical military description and the confused rhetoric of battle-pieces, in which the mind is usually hopelessly lost. The book is a simple description of the method and incidents of the March, with sketches of the rebel residents whom the author personally encountered, and with whom his observations are often illustrative and piquant. The careless and fragmentary order of a diary not inapply reproduces the impression of the March itself, and the natural simplicity makes the reader an actual sharer in the great movement. Major NICHOLS writes with a soldier's frankness, in a way; but without pretension he shows himself thoroughly alive to the significance of the stupendous campaign in which he became a part. Toward the close of his work he draws a general but extremely effective picture of the desolating results of the march through Georgia. The reader is reminded of the General's words to the Mayor of Atlanta: "War is cruelty." It is clear from the vivid testimony of Major NICHOLS that the rebellion was subdued only because the country was absolutely harried and devastated. "History," he says, "will be searched in vain for a parallel to the startling and destructive effect of the invasion of the Carolinas." Speaking of the people of North Carolina, he says: "Every one of the inhabitants of a region forty miles in width, stretching from Savannah and Port Royal through South Carolina to Goldsborough in North Carolina, agriculture and commerce, even if peace come speedily, can not be fully revived in our day.....Injury to private dwellings was inevitable and food for present necessities was often left for the women and children; but in all the length and breadth of that broad pathway, the burning of war pressed heavily, blasting and withering where it fell. It was the penalty of treason." Like every candid observer, Major NICHOLS testifies to the steady fidelity of the negroes, who gave all kinds of information, and in the prolonged absence of the war, utterly and instinctively disdaining the incessant lies of the rebels in regard to the Yankees. He also relates the cruel desertion by masters and mistresses of slaves helpless by age and infirmity. Howell COBB, one of the basest and meanest of the rebels, was guilty of this cowardice. Major NICHOLS adds a valuable appendix, containing General SHERMAN'S private testimony before the Committee on the War, and interesting statistics of the Quarter-master's and Commissary's departments. The author's estimate of General SHERMAN is eminently very flattering, and he is inclined to see every officer of whom he speaks through the rosiest glasses. But the whole story is told in a most kindly and humane. The style is at once spirited and simple, and the graphic Story of the Great March comes out in time for reading at the great summer rest by the sea and among the hills.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SOUTH.

GOVERNOR PERRY on the 20th of July issued his proclamation to the people of South Carolina. In the first place, he declares that all civil officers in South Carolina who were in office on May last, when the civil government of the State was suspended, except those arrested or under prosecution for treason, shall, on taking the oath of allegiance prescribed by the President's Amnesty Proclamation, resume the duties of their offices, and hold them during such further appointments are made. He announces it to be the duty of all loyal citizens promptly to take the oath of allegiance. The election for members of a State Convention is appointed for the first Monday in September. As many members will be elected in each district as the district has Members of the House of Representatives. This will give one hundred and twenty-four members to the Convention, which will convene in Columbia on the 13th of September. He admonishes all the former owners of freedmen to look upon them, and to treat them, as children or aged to perish.

On the 7th inst. the Mississippi elected members to the State Convention which will be held on the 14th.

The remaining six States are to hold elections and conventions as follows:

State.	Time of Election.	Time of Convention.
Alabama	Aug. 31, 1865	Sept. 13, 1865.
South Carolina	Sept. 4, 1865	Sept. 13, 1865.
North Carolina	Sept. 4, 1865
Georgia	Oct. 4, 1865	Oct. 25, 1865.
Louisiana	At an early period as practicable.
Florida	At as early a period as practicable.
Texas	Not mentioned in proclamation.

The Governor of Texas issued proclamation July 21, and on the 26th issued his proclamation to the people of Texas. His proclamation we are sorry to say is not quite so speaking than any other we have noticed. He does not, like Governor PERRY, require those State officers who have acted under the rebel administration. He states plainly that slavery no longer exists, and that the freedmen will be treat the negro as a free man also will in vain seek admission to Congress.

Major-General Palmer, commanding the Department of Kentucky, has issued a communication to Governor Johnson, in which he explains the difficulties he has to contend with in the regulation of affairs in the late State. In consequence of the excitement there regarding slavery, and the different interpretations made to its improper pro-slavery orators the General says that the blacks were forbid by Governor Johnson and others, and to fall those peace of the extraordinary accumulation of this evil and prejudice he has assumed it proper to announce to such of the colored people as will leave the State and cross to the North that they will be free to do so. He considers it impossible, under the existing condition of affairs, to enforce the State laws in relation to slavery. He announces that there are now not more than about fifty thousand slaves remaining in the State, and the number is rapidly lessening, and at the commencement of the war, and says that slavery has no actual existence in the State, and that if the Constitutional Amendment for its abolition fails to receive a majority of the whole number of votes cast for it.

In General Curtis's District of Southwestern Virginia, General Gregg, commanding at Lynchburg, has recently issued an order declaring that the privileges granted by parole conferred only the right to remain unmolested in good behavior. When a paroled prisoner insults any officer of the Government, which grades him, he is liable to all its benefits and becomes a prisoner of war, liable to be ordered to the rear of the captor or punished as a military commission may direct.

LOSS OF THE "GLASGOW."

The steamship Glasgow, of the Inman line, was burned at sea July 31. The vessel took fire at noon, and grand excitement prevailed. The Captain, Thomas Kennedy, by his promptness and courage, restored and maintained such perfect discipline that not a life was lost. The boats were carefully lowered and filled, the women and children being first, while the crew from Captain Kennedy to their mate who endeavored to enter the boats before the women and children, remained at their posts until the last and minute-gun fired, with a coolness remarkable under the circumstances. The situation of the Glasgow was not extracted. On the approach of the vessel the lowered boats of the Dictator, with the crew and passengers, got off from the burning steamer, and were received with every display of sympathy and consolation on board the Rosamond by Captain Wallis. Even the baggage of the passengers was saved. The Rosamond was brought to somewhat short of water, and when the Erin came to at 6 P.M. on the 30 inst., it was determined to transfer the crew and passengers of the Glasgow to this latter vessel. The Erin had already on board 1100 steerage passengers, but willingly conveyed the passengers to New York, which they reached on the 1st inst. The Glasgow arrived in New York for Liverpool July 26. The fire started in some manner unknown on the after part of the vessel occupied by the steerage passengers. It is supposed to have originated from one of the passengers throwing a lighted match in the cotton. The Glasgow makes the twenty-sixth steamer that has while plying between this country and Europe during the past twenty-seven years.

THE MANCHESTER MURDER.

ONE of the most horrible and unusual murders on record was committed on the morning of August 1, at the railway of Guilford, Manchester, Connecticut, and about nine miles from Hartford. The victims were Mrs. Hannah Bidwell and her daughter, Miss Ellen M. Bidwell. The murderer was Albert Starkweather, son of the one woman and friend of the other. The bodies of the daughter were mangled and butchered most cruelly, a log dropped with an axe and then shot with a pistol and a butcher knife. Albert Starkweather, the murderer, is now in custody at Hartford. After being committed to prison he made a full confession.

NEWS ITEMS.

WE learn by the Atlantic that on the 29th July, when the Great Eastern was 700 miles out, the insulation of the cable gave out. The electricity escaped, and the line was gone.

It was order, dated July 28, the following general officers were assigned to their Departments, and directed to report to their respective commanders forthwith:

The degree of LL.D. has been conferred upon Hon. E. H. Rollins, of New Hampshire, on Colonel Chamberlain and on Brevet-General Grant by Bowdoin College, Maine.

Brevet-General Edward Ord has been assigned to the regular army, to date from March 26.

THE ELECTRIC UNION

COLLEGE REGATTA—BOAT-RACE BETWEEN THE YALE AND HARVARD BOYS ON LAKE QUINSIGAMOND, JULY 26, 1865.

ISAAC PIERSON—WEIGHT 150 POUNDS.

EDMUND COFFIN WEIGHT 146 POUNDS.

THE REGATTA AT WORCESTER.

AT the close of the literary and commemorative celebrations, which have this year been centres of the liveliest interest, at Yale and Harvard, the chosen representatives of the two colleges entered upon the usual exciting competition for the champion flag. The race took place July 28 on Lake Quinsigamond, about three miles distant from Worcester, Massachusetts.

Some years ago, and until 1863, the boat organizations of Yale were separate from each other, and were broken up with the departure of their members from the college. This is the case at Harvard even now. But in 1863 the Yale boys inaugurated perpetual clubs, which swallowed up and absorbed all the petty clubs which had before existed. This navy has representatives from all of the four classes in college, about 20 or 25 Freshmen being elected from the Freshman class every year for each club. There are now two clubs at Yale in the Academic Department, the Glynna and Yarnua.

The scientific school has also its separate organization. All the clubs are united under the title of the Yale Navy, with a Commodore and other officers elected by the votes of all members of the navy.

In Harvard the old system of class-clubs still prevails, and they find it attended with all the inconveniences which attended them at Yale. There is no corporate body called the Harvard Navy, but each club is independent. Instead of one boat-house to accommodate all these, are several small ones for the various associations. It is a custom with them to have the stroke-oar of the University crew select his successor, and he in turn chooses the prize-crew.

On the day of the race all the hotels in Worcester were crowded to their utmost limit. The day was favorable, the lake as suitable a sheet of water as could have been selected; and the Yale boys with their blue ribbons and the Harvard with their red were all on hand and "ready for the fray." There had been six boatmen trained on each side.

Yale won the inside, but Harvard got the advantage at the start, and was nearly a quarter of a length ahead when the boats passed the stand. Yale pulled swift strokes and Harvard slow, and it was not long before the former began to gain on the latter and came in ahead at the end of the race. Yale made the most extraordinary time on record in this country, and surpassing even the professional oarsmen of the English Universities; she came in at the end of 17 minutes and 42½ seconds. The time made by Harvard was 18 minutes and 9 seconds. There were three umpires—Mr. WILLIAM WOOD of New York for Yale, Mr. R. H. DERBY for Harvard, and Mr. JOSEPH WARD for referee.

The boatmen representing the two colleges have been under the most careful gymnastic training for several weeks—the Harvard boys under the supervision of Mr. MOLYNEAUX, and those of Yale under Mr. WILLIAM WOOD, Professor of Gymnastics and Physical Education, 101 Fifth Avenue, New York. This gentleman gave instruction to the Yale College crew, as we have said, and the result of the race is certainly a most flattering compliment to his skill and fidelity as a gymnastic teacher.

There has been some dispute as to the time made, but it is now generally agreed to have been as we have stated above.

WILBUR BACON—WEIGHT 153 POUNDS.

EDWARD BENNETT—WEIGHT 158 POUNDS.

W. W. SCRANTON—WEIGHT 148 POUNDS.

LEWIS STOSKOFF—WEIGHT 168 POUNDS.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER OF HAWAII.

THE Queen Dowager EMMA, of Hawaii, whose portrait we give on our first page, arrived in England on 14th July. The Queen Dowager EMMA is partially of white extraction, since, though she belongs on the mother's side to a race of native chieftains, her father was a grandson of JOHN YOUNG, one of the companions of VANCOUVER. She was married in 1856 to her Majesty KAMEHAMEHA IV., who died in 1863. The only son of KAMEHAMEHA and EMMA died in 1862, and the throne was consequently occupied by KAMEHAMEHA V., the brother of the late King, who is the present sovereign of Hawaii.

The Queen Dowager is of very pleasing appearance and graceful and dignified carriage, her manners and habits being those of the aristocracy of Europe. Her education has been adapted to her high station, and her amiability of temper and benevolence of disposition have secured for her the affection of her people. She is a member of the Episcopal Church.

The present King of Hawaii is thirty-five years of age, and is physically a fine example of the native race. Under his reign the affairs of the kingdom have made rapid progress, and he has developed the constitutional Government which was instituted in 1848. There are two Americans in this Kingdom—C. C. HARRIS, the Minister of Justice, and E. H. ALLEN, Keeper of the Seals.

Hawaii is the largest and most southerly of the Sandwich Islands, and is, in fact, twice as large as all the rest put together, being a hundred miles long and above eighty miles wide. It is wholly volcanic, and appears to be an upheaval, with a crater a deposit from the numerous volcanoes of which it forms the base, the southern coasts being composed almost entirely of lava or volcanic cinders, the masses of which are broken into deep caverns, the abode of innumerable wild fowl, or rising into the most perpendicular cliffs, against which the sea dashes in frequent storms.

GENERAL NATHANIEL A. MILES.

AMONG the brilliant lights of the Second Corps General NATHANIEL A. MILES stood almost the first. As Colonel of the Sixty-first New York his record shows the most efficient service, which frequently attracted attention from his superior officers. His regiment belonged to the Second Corps before the consolidation of that corps with the Sixth Third. When Meade moved from the Rapidan May 4, 1864, General MILES commanded the First Brigade of the First Division, Second Corps, Hancow commanded the division, a position which we afterward assumed by MILES during the temporary absence of the latter officer. It is impossible to refer again to the proud history of the Second Corps, but in all the achievements of that corps on the battle-field MILES's brigade or division was in the front ranks. Not many of the West Point students have gained for themselves such fame as justly belongs to General MILES, of the volunteer army.

General MILES now commands Fortress Monroe, in which Davis is incarcerated. It has been necessary for him to be commandant of this post to exercise a severity toward the prisoner which would have been unnecessary if the ex-President of the Southern Confederacy had exhibited a more becoming behavior.

CHIEF ENGINEER KINGSLAND.

MR. ELISHA KINGSLAND, whose portrait we give on our first page, died on Friday, July 28, 1865, by the Commissioners Chief Engineer of the Metropolitan Fire Department. The election took place at FIREMEN'S HALL.

MR. KINGSLAND is an old and tried fireman, having served in the old volunteer organization for nineteen years. He entered the service as a private with Engine Company No. 32 in 1846. The Company was changed to 26, and KINGSLAND was elected its first foreman, which office he held until 1853. He was then elected Assistant Engineer, in which position he served for twenty years. He was also Street Inspector of the Seventeenth Ward for eight years.

MR. KINGSLAND is of the old Knickerbocker stock, and is forty-one years old. He is a man of steady habits, and will no doubt successfully manage the new organization.

THE FLIGHT OF DAVIS.

THOUGH published at a somewhat late period, the illustrations which we give this week relating to JEFF DAVIS will not fail to prove of great interest to our readers. After the capitulation of General JOHNSTON there was virtually no armed force left east of the Mississippi; and JEFF DAVIS, already a fugitive from Richmond, having been driven from the capital of Virginia by the surrender of Lee's army, found himself quite near the border by the wayside, seeking some means of escape from the National colonies, which were gathering upon him in all directions. The artist, whose sketches we engrave, accompanied Mr. DAVIS in his flight to within forty-eight hours of his capture.

The subject of one of the illustrations is the scene presented by a sudden alarm, or stampede, which was a very frequent occurrence, owing to the proximity of the National cavalry, who were frequently within three miles of the camp of the flying President. A scout had only to dash in and give the alarm when every thing went helter skelter along the road—President, ministers, cavalrymen, four-mules wagons, and terrified negro servants, all jumbled up together.

The other illustration shows the farewell of MR. DAVIS to his escort and staff in the square of Washington, Georgia. It was here that he determined to continue his flight almost alone; and, mounting a mule, found him who had sacrificed every thing to the defeated cause, he, with tears in his eyes, begged them to seek their own safety and leave him to meet his fate. Undoubtedly it was an ill-advised arrangement which brought an escort of 1500 men in the train of a man fleeing for his life; and, when too late, DAVIS saw the error of thus attracting the attention of the entire country through which he passed, and disbanded them but forty-eight hours before his capture.

OUR DEAD AT ANDERSONVILLE.

Not in the fierce and frenzied shock of war,
Not in the battle's fiery, deadly league,
And clash of arms, and deafening roar of guns,
Met they their Death.

In foul prison-pens, with stealthy tread,
He came, and took them slowly, one by one;
And they that lingered saw their comrades' eyes
Close softly on the sun—

Saw their pale eyelids close, and felt the hour
Draw nearer to themselves, till Death became
As one of them, and with each suffering day
Familiar grew his name.

Sometimes the sentry's gun, with sharp report,
Would send some poor soul on a braver errand flight.
Who, weary of his prison's gloom, stepp'd forth
Boldly into the light!

Great God, within that hook Thy Angel kept
Are souls that perished—each unknown, yet dear!
O blot them from our memories, and heal
Each sorrow-broken heart that bleeds!

Our land is one vast sepulchre—we rise
The swelling mounds; the dust which in them lies
Is our rich prize—richly cherished Freedom claims,
Our Nation's sacrifice.

There shall not now be nameless! he shall read
His name—whom Love, beyond his woman's bond,
Each hero's name; in future years untold
Mute records they shall stand—

Mute records, they, of valor, courage, love,
Of stern endurance and self-sacrifice ended;
And with each name upon those pillars graved
Here shall be blended.

HALF A MILLION OF MONEY

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE RIFLE MATCH.

At half past two an open carriage drove up to the ground, and four ladies alighted. They were received by the Committee, conducted to their seats, and presented with written programmes of the games. Miss Colonna was installed in the centre box, Lord Castletowers, who placed a little in advance of the other seats, and dignified with a foot-stool, was styled, somewhat ambiguously, Lady Arabella's chaperon. When taken their places when two more carriages appeared upon the scene, the first of which contained Lady Arabella Walkinghaw, with her son Hatherton, and the second, Mrs. Cadogan, the wife of the Sedgebrook vicar, and her two daughters. The latter, however, drove on to the ring, what was doing in the park, had come over to see the sports; but Lady Arabella's visit was made in exclusive pursuance of her own little game, and bore no kind of reference to any that might be going on by other people. She had therefore, rather put out than otherwise when, instead of finding Lady Castlowers at home, she was informed that "they had gone across to the park to see the gentlemen race, and had left word, if any friends called at the house, that there was to be shooting in the park, and to follow." Miss Hatherton, however, was delighted.

"It's perfectly charming," said she, as they turned down the drive that led to the park and to the park indicated by the servant. "I can not think how pleased I am, Lady Arabella. Will you, my dear, then I am pleased too," rejoiced Lady Arabella, benevolently.

"Of shooting I suppose there is much as contests of this kind," Miss Hatherton went on to say. "Boat-races, horse-races, reviews, any thing, so long as there is a prize to be won and lost. Why, I haven't missed a Derby-day for the last five years; and as for the Roman Carnival, the only thing I care for in it is the horse-race. It always sorry the Jews don't run instead. It would be so much more amusing."

"You are greatly improved, Lady Arabella, with a faint smile. "I wonder if Mr. Trefalden will take part in these games?"

"Of course he will—he will win all before him. He's as fleet as a chamois, depend on it."

"I hope he won't be hurt," said Lady Arabella, with a little lady-like shudder.

"And I hope, above all things, that they will. But then, you know, my dear, I am blessed with no nerves. Why, this is delightful—there's quite a crowd!"

And so there was. News is contagious, and propagates itself as mysteriously as the potato disease. The whole neighborhood had already heard, somehow or another, of what was doing at the park, and every farmer, game-keeper, and idle fellow about the place was on the ground long before the hour appointed. Even the women and children, nothing short of Polygamy would account for their presence.

"Lady Arabella Walkinghaw and Miss Hatherton!" said Lord Castletowers, hastening to the carriage-door as they drove up. "This is indeed a happy accident. You have been to the house, I suppose, to call upon my mother."

"We have; but with no idea that we were coming to a—a fête of this kind," replied Lady Arabella, somewhat at a loss for the most appropriate word, and anxious to avoid any gracious smiles with the ladies on the platform.

"Then I hope you will stay and dine with us this evening, you ely man?" asked Miss Hatherton.

"Because I then knew no more about it than yourself, my dear," replied the Earl. "It is an improvisation."

"And what are you going to do?"

"A little of every thing—rifle-shooting, leaping, running; but you shall have a programme presently, and if you will alight, I can give you seats beside my mother."

With this he gave his arm to Lady Arabella, and conducted both ladies to the place of honor.

"But where are the competitors?" said Miss Hatherton, when the dog greetings had all been exchanged, and they had taken their seats "and above all, where's my friend, the noble savage?"

"Forbidden? Oh, he's in our tent, out-under. This affair was his idea entirely."

"And an admirable idea, too. But he'll beat you, you know."

"He would, if he came forward," replied the Earl, "but he declines to compete."

"Declines to compete?" echoed the heiress.

"Yes—for every thing except the last race—and that we all go in for."

"I never heard of such a thing!" exclaimed Miss Hatherton, indignantly. "Why, it's as if the favorite were put out of the betting at the moment from the Derby—and I, too, who had intended to back him to any extent! I declare I was never more disappointed in my life. What's his motive?"

"He said he was out of practice," replied Castletowers, hesitatingly.

"Nonsense. That wasn't his real motive. He knew nobody else would have a chance, and he was too good-natured to carry off all the honors."

"Do you really think so?" said Miss Colonna, suddenly. She had listened to the conversation till now with keen interest, but in silence.

"I do, indeed. What does Lord Castletowers say?"

"I say that Miss Hatherton is right, and I know her to be right. Trefalden could write his name in bullets on that target if he chose—but he won't."

Miss Hatherton turned to Miss Colonna in a glow of enthusiasm.

"That's true nobleness!" she exclaimed.

"Indeed it is," said Castletowers. "He's the finest fellow I have ever known, savage or civilized."

But Miss Colonna said nothing.

"I wish you would back him my way, Lord Castletowers," said the heiress. "I like talking to him; he amuses me immensely."

"Does he?" said the Lord-and-by," laughed the Earl; "but he is our judge in the rifle-matches and can't be appealed from. Excuse me—here's another carriage full of ladies. I am master of the ceremonies."

And with this he ran off to receive the Cadogans.

And now the appointed hour being not only come, but considerably before expected, and the audience considerable, it was decided that they should begin.

The first contest was seen to cross the course and enter the cricketing tent at the farther end, whence he presently emerged with his cartridge, and, taking up his rifle in his hand. He was followed by five others similarly equipped; and by Trefalden, who, in his quality of judge, took up a safe position to the right of the target. Miss Hatherton surveyed them through her opera-glass as they came over the ground and placed themselves about a dozen yards off, with their backs to the stand.

"Dear me! they look very near us," said Lady Arabella, with that sort of pretty timidity that is less charming at eight-and-forty than at eighteen. "I hope they are not dangerous."

"Don't be alarmed, my dear friend," said Miss Hatherton. "Gentlemen don't generally fire behind their backs. Look! Mr. Major Vaughan begins—and a very good shot, too—very near the bull's eye. Now it's that remarkably handsome man next to the right?"

The question was addressed to Miss Colonna, but it received no answer. Olimpia heard the words, as she heard the report of the first rifle, without attaching any import to the sound, just as her eyes rested upon the target, but saw nothing. She was absorbed in thought, very painful thought, as it would seem, by the strange dark way in which her brows drawn together, and her fingers were mechanically twisting and tearing the programme which they held.

Miss Hatherton repeated the request the inquiry; but seeing the expression on Olimpia's face, remained silent. It was an expression that startled her, and puzzled her as much as it startled her. An expression such as one sees but seldom in the course of one's busy life; neither selfish, nor resolute, nor hopeless, nor defiant, but a blending, perhaps, of all three, with something else that might have been compunction—or fear.

Curiosity so far prevailed that for some three or four seconds Miss Hatherton continued to look at Olimpia instead of watching the competitors, and thus, to her infinite mortification, lost the thread of the firing. Of course none of the ladies on the platform could help her. They saw the riflemen, and they saw the marks on the target, but they could discern from that the situation of the order in which those marks had been dealt, or of the hands that had bestowed them. The first round, a round of rounds, had been over, having been fired out, the question was set at rest by the announcement that Sir Charles Burgoyne had carried off the first prize. Sir Charles Burgoyne sauntered up accordingly to the front of the platform, and received the cup from Miss Colonna's hand with the best-bred air of indifference in the world.

"You don't share my passion for these contests, Miss Colonna," said the heiress, in the pause that ensued between the first and second match. "If you did you had vanished from Olimpia's face long since; but Miss Hatherton could not forget it—would have given something to know what it portended.

"Indeed you mistake. I think them very interesting," replied Olimpia.

"But of course they can not have so much interest for you as for me. Your sympathies are bound up in a great cause, and you must have fewer small emotions on hand."

"Perhaps," said Olimpia, with a forced smile. "No bad news from Italy, I hope?"

"The news is all present," replied Olimpia, "is neither bad nor good. It is a season of anxious suspense, for all hearts are in the cause."

"You look anxious," said Miss Hatherton, kindly but inquisitively. "Is it, I thought just now I never saw a face look so anxious as yours. You didn't seem to remark the firing at all."

A crimson tide rushed to Olimpia's face, flooded it, and ebbed away, leaving her paler than before.

"I am quite strong enough," she replied, coldly, "to sustain more than one full to my share."

The competitors for the second rifle match were now on the ground, and the conversation ceased. There were but four this time—Lord Castletowers, Sir Charles Burgoyne, Major Vaughan, and Lieutenant Torrington. Having fired six each, they fired alternately, one shot at a time, in their order as they stood—Vaughan first, Torrington second, Castletowers third, and Burgoyne fourth. It became evident, after the first two rounds, that Vaughan, although a good shot, was much inferior to both Castletowers and Burgoyne, and that Torrington was nowhere. Miss Hatherton and Miss Colonna were the only two ladies who could follow the shots or understand the scoring; and this they did with a degree of interest quite incomprehensible to Lady Arabella, who had drew near the vicar's lay between Burgoyne and the Earl. Miss Hatherton's excitement knew no bounds.

"That is Lord Castletowers," she exclaimed. "See how cool he is! See how steadily he holds up his gun—not to one, given to two guineas. Will nobody take me? In the white, I vow, and all but in the very centre! Beat that, Sir Charles, if you can!"

"He will not beat it," said Olimpia, in a low, earnest voice.

Miss Hatherton glanced at her again, but scarcely for a second. She was too deeply interested in the next shot to care much about Olimpia's agitation. But she saw Olimpia's pastel lips, and the outlooking light in her eyes, and thought of both afterward.

Sir Charles and Lord Castletowers had scored four three times, and three twice, making a total of twenty-one. Major Charles had scored four, and three twice, making a total of fourteen. The next shot would be his fifth and last. If he hit the bull's-eye he would be a dozen points between Castletowers and himself, and they would have to try again for the victory; but if he scored any thing less than the Earl must win.

There was a moment of intense suspense. Sir Charles brought up his gun very slowly, took aim twice before he fired, and delivered an excellent shot just on the line dividing the bull's eye from the centre ring. He had lost by the difference of a hair.

The spectators round the ropes set up a faint response to cheers with their aspirate's but no competitors rushed up to the target in an excited way; and Saxon, too well pleased to care for the moment for the prize-money he heard him or not, shook his friend by both hands, exclaiming:

"I am so glad, Castletowers—so heartily glad! I did wish you to win those pistols!"

Miss Colonna's smile was cold and indifferent enough when she turned and congratulated the receive his prize; but her hand trembled, and Miss Hatherton's sharp eyes saw it.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

HOW A FAIR LADY GAVE HER TRUE KNIGHT A QUERIST.

THE long jump was passed, the hurdle and hundred yards race was run—Mr. Guy Greville winning the first by four inches, and Major Vaughan the second by four seconds; and with the great race remained to be contested. In the mean while, half an hour was allowed for rest and refreshment. The gentlemen repaired to the platform in a mongrel costume compounded of flannel waistcoats, cricketing shoes, pocket-handkerchiefs, and over-coats of various descriptions; so that they looked like cricketing men below and boating men above. Several glided solemnly about with Madeira and biscuits. The ladies congratulated the victors, and the victors congratulated one another, and the platform took up the ropes strolled about respectfully, and did a little subdued betting among themselves; and the conversation on the platform was broken up into coteries. One of these consisted of Lady Arabella Walkinghaw, Lady Castletowers, and Miss Hatherton.

"Vaughan ran well, didn't he?" said the Earl. "I thought at one moment that Greville would have outpaced him; but Vaughan had the most wind, and steady did it."

"He was very well, I dare-say, to reserve your sporting phraseology for your male friends," said Lady Castletowers, coldly. "You forget that I am not a connoisseur of rounds, and wind and vigors."

"I beg your pardon, my dear mother; but it seems so naturally when sport is the topic of conversation," replied her son. "I hope you are amused, Lady Arabella?"

"Oh yes, thank you—when you don't fire."

"There is, at all events, nothing undignified in firing," observed the Countess.

"I hope you do not think our athletic games undignified, mother?" said the Earl.

"Not in general, certainly. For boys or peasants, not at all."

"But a gentleman has as many and as good muscles as a peasant. A gentleman values strength and speed as much, and sometimes more, that he values Greek and Latin; but, like Greek and Latin, strength and speed must be kept up by frequent exercise."

"I have no wish to argue the question," said Lady Castletowers. "It is enough that I set a higher value on skill than force, and that it gives me no gratification to see half a dozen gentlemen racing round a piece of sward for the entertainment of a mob of gamekeepers and plowmen."

"Nay, for our own entertainment and yours, dearest mother," replied the young man, gently, "We have never yet shut our park-gates on these good people; but their presence goes for nothing in what we do to-day."

He spoke very deferentially, but with a faint flush of annoyance on his face, and passed on to where Miss Hatherton was chatting with Saxon Trefalden.

"It will be a long time," she said, "before I can forgive you for my disappointment of this morning. And I know I am right. You could have beaten every body at every thing if you had pleased. It was an absurd piece of Quixotism, and I am very angry with you for it. There—don't attempt to deny it. Lord Castletowers has confessed, and it is of no use for you to plead not guilty."

"Lord Castletowers never saw me leap a foot or even a yard in his life," said Saxon, emphatically. "He knows nothing of what I can, or can not do."

"I am here to answer for myself," said the Earl, laying his hand on the boy's shoulder. "And I do know that you can put a bullet through a shifting weather-cock at five hundred yards."

"A mere trick."

"Not so. Skill is no more to be confounded with trickery than pocket-picking with legerdemain. I am entirely of Miss Hatherton's opinion, and am certain you could have beaten us all round if you had chosen to take the trouble."

"You will find out your mistake presently when you have all left me in peace," said the Saxon, a little impatiently; "I would recommend no one to bet upon me."

"I mean to bet upon you, Mr. Trefalden," said Miss Hatherton.

"Pray don't; you will be sure to lose your money."

"I don't believe it, or if I do, I shall call upon you to pay my debts, for I shall be certain you have juggled behind on purpose."

At this moment one or two of the others came up, and the conversation turned upon the preceding contests.

"Mr. Trefalden," said Miss Colonna, "will you be kind enough to tell me how many times you have to make the circuit of the ground in this one-mile race?"

"Exactly six times, Mademoiselle."

"Will you come round to this side, Mr. Trefalden?" said Olimpia, in a low tone, "I have something to say to you."

Not without some vague sense of surprise, the young man passed on behind the second chair, and presented himself at Miss Colonna's left hand.

"You are really going to contest this one-mile race, are you not?" she asked.

"I have entered my name with the rest," replied Saxon.

"Then you mean, of course, to win if you can?"

Saxon looked embarrassed.

"I have entered my name," said he, "but I am not sure that I shall run for all that. Somebody must set an judge; and I prefer not to race if I can help it."

"But I particularly prefer that you should race, Mr. Trefalden," said Olimpia, dropping her voice to a still lower key. "I want you to win me that purse of twenty guineas for my dear Italy."

"It will be yours, and Italy's, Mademoiselle, whoever wins it."

"I know that, Mr. Trefalden."

"Then what difference can it make whether I or another carry off the prize?" said Saxon, wonderingly.

"It does make a difference," replied Olimpia, lifting her eyes suddenly to his.

Saxon felt flustered, without knowing why.

"What difference?" faltered he.

"Must I tell you?"

"If—if you please."

"Will you promise to win for me, if I do?"

"I don't know; I will try."

"I ask no more than that. If you really try I am confident of victory. Will then, I want you to win because—I suppose, because I am a woman; and all women are capricious."

Saxon looked puzzled.

"I don't think you are capricious," he said.

"Do you not? Then I am afraid that is because you are a man; and all men are vain. There is a pair of maxims for you."

"Maxims for which I can discover no application," replied Saxon, laughingly. "Why should I be accused of vanity because I refuse to believe that Mademoiselle Colonna is guilty of caprice?"

"I am afraid you are very dull to-day, Mr. Trefalden, or very subtle."

"I know I am not subtle," said Saxon, "but I must be decidedly dull."

"If your feet do not outstrip your apprehension you will scarcely win the cup; and—what shall it then?"

"It's the signal for assembling," replied Saxon, "I must go now; and you have not told me after all."

"But you have promised me that you will try."

"No, no—my promise was conditional on your explanation."

"But have I not told you that women are capricious?"

"What of that?"

"We sometimes value a cowslip from one hand more than a rose from another; and—and perhaps I am so capricious as to prefer the cowslip from you. Hush! there is the second bell! Now, go, and win the prize."

The tone in which this was said—the gesture, half persuasive, half imperious—the dazzling smile by which it was accompanied, were more than enough to turn all older heads than Saxon Trefalden's. He stammered something, he scarcely knew what; and his heart leaped, he scarcely knew why.

"If you do not go at once," said Miss Colonna, "you will be too late. Shall I give you my glove for a favor? Be a true knight, and deserve it."

Breathless, intoxicated, the young man pressed the glove to his lips, thrust it into his bosom, leaped down upon the course, and flew to take his place among the racers. He felt as if the feet were clad in the winged sandals of Hermes; as if his head touched the clouds, and the very air were sunshine. It was delightful, this sense of exaltation and rapture—and quite new.

Not so, however, felt Olimpia Colonna. Saxon had no sooner jumped from the platform than the color died out suddenly from her face, and the smile from her lips. She leaded back in her chair with a look of intense pain and weariness, and sighed heavily. There were three persons observing her; but her thoughts were very bitter at that moment, and she was quite unconscious of their scrutiny. Those persons were Lady Castletowers, Miss Hatherton, who had but just arrived, and was leaning on the back of her chair; and Miss Hatherton—and neither she nor the Earl saw the sigh was lost on either of the three.

THE TROOPER'S FAREWELL TO HIS STEED.

Farewell, farewell, O my gallant steed!
Who have scorned with me the plain,
O never will we together move
In the fiery charge again;
Never again will the king sound
For us so sweet and so solemn—
Never again o'er the reeking ground
Will we career with the rolling column.

Farewell, farewell, O my gallant steed!
Who will bear me never more
In the dust and heat of the weary march,
Or the maddening battle's roar;
No more for us will the sabres clang,
Or the deadly carbines rattle;
No more will you snort with your nostrils wide
The smoke of the distant battle.

Farewell, farewell, O my gallant steed!
No more shall we scour the plain,
No more at dawn shall the trumpets call
Awaken us both again;
No more o'er the battle's winding way
The trail of the foe we'll follow,
While far over river and field and hill
Sound the bugle clear and hollow.

Farewell, farewell, O my gallant steed!
Farewell, for never again
Will we scour along in the serried ranks,
And the light wind lift your mane;
O never again on the dashing raid
Will we move in the crowded column—
O never again will we hail at night
'Neath the starlight pale and solemn!

Farewell, farewell, O my gallant steed!
Who will bear me never more
In the dust and heat of the weary march
Or the maddening battle's roar;
Farewell, farewell, for at last we part
Who have comrades been in battle,
Mid the sabre's clash and the cannon's roar
And the deadly rifle's rattle.

FALSE STEPS.

IT would be very interesting to know how many even sensible men ever are free from a conviction that, at some point in the road of their lives, they have taken a wrong turning, and in how many cases the grounds of self-reproach would be found to be quite baseless. People often are fond of attributing to a false step a want of success that is really due to incapacity. A man persuades himself, for instance, that he might have been at the head of his profession had only adopted some other course than the one he actually followed at a certain stage in his career; when the truth is that, whatever course he had adopted, he could never have risen beyond the level of mediocrity. The reflection soothes his vanity and restores his self-esteem. For although the fact of having taken a wrong turning indicates in itself a deficiency of judgment, still every body is ready to pardon himself for a weakness which he thinks is only temporary. To be able to trace the failure of a life to a single blunder permits one to believe that on all other occasions every thing has been done to insure success that mortal could do. We are naturally very lenient to ourselves if we can think that we have not lost our way more than once or twice, and that afterward no pains or discretion have been spared in endeavoring to recover the lost ground. Ill-fortune bears the blame for all the rest. We did wrong, it is true; but then, if luck had not been incorrigibly hostile, the error would speedily have been repaired, and all would have gone on well. And, after a certain time, a man gets into the way of looking back even upon the false step to which he pleads guilty as something for which he was not altogether responsible. Just as people can go on telling an untrue story until they believe it to be true, they can in the same way go on ascribing all their ills to some one mistake, until at last they begin to forget that the mistake was their own, and to talk of it as they might be expected to talk of a knight that had descended upon them from the clouds.

There is a rather striking circumstance that the matter in which men and women most commonly take a serious false step is that which is least readily forgiven by society. Probably about the most fatal blunder that any body can perpetrate is a bad marriage; and, moreover, of all blunders this is the commonest. It is almost within the parties to it most carefully conceal from themselves. The reluctance which people feel to recognize, even in their own minds, the most palpable mistake such as this, is a measure of the sincerity with which they are willing to attribute ill-fortune to their mistakes in other pieces of conduct. Certainly nobody can blame them for making the best of what is irretrievable. If a man finds that his wife is shamefully extravagant, or a great fool, or a shrew, he may be more than pardoned for trying not to see what a fearful burden he has undertaken to bear to the end of his neck. And when a woman finds that her husband is a tyrant, or intolerably self-opinionated, or openly unfaithful to her, she is right in making the best of her bargain. Where a real false step has been taken, every body does all he can to make it as little of a false step as he can. When people are found bemoaning some one blunder as the cause of all their ills, instead of leaving the blunder to itself, they usually prove either that they do not mean what they say, or else that their ills have been the inevitable results, not of one false step, but of a confirmed habit of mental staggering and stumbling. It is not so easy for a man to ruin his life by a single act. Marriage, however, is the most decisive and the easiest of such acts, if we may also include under the term those clandestine connections which can only be described negatively as not marriages. The man who marries without knowing more than the mere surface of his wife's character, or without having ascertained the cost of bringing up a family, takes almost the one step in ordinary life which there is no power of retracing, and which may lead him hopelessly away from the kind and amount of success which he might otherwise have reached.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A FATHER-IN-LAW.—What is the legal relation in which a tenant stands to his landlord?—To love pay-rent-is.

AN Irish lad, having been asked if the man who had just flogged him was his father, replied, "Faith, he's the parent he is; but he trates me as if I was his son by another father and mother, bad luck to him."

AN ECONOMICAL RIDER.—An Irishman observed a postilion with only one spur, and inquired the reason. "Why, what would I be wanting with another?" said the postilion; "if one side of the horse goes the other can't stand still."

A shoemaker was the other day fitting a customer with a pair of boots, when the latter observed that he had one objection to them, which was that the soles were a little too thick. "Oh, that is all," replied Crispin, "put on the boots, and the objection will gradually vear away."

AN Irish car-driver, in his list of journey expenses, charged "sixpence for the horse, Sir." On inquiry it turned out that the rogue meant a whip-cord.

AN awkward, ill-dressed countryman, who was strolling about the streets of Paris, on the other day, attracted considerable attention on account of his absurd appearance. Becoming conscious of the fact, he turned to a gentleman who was looking at him with open-mouthed surprise, and exclaimed,

"Hallo, mister, if you keep your mouth so wide open you'll soon burn your teeth!" and walked away triumphant amidst the laughter his sally called forth.

RATHER THIN.—A ludicrous incident occurred at a small theatre in North Berlin read not long since. The hotel at which the piece is ornamented with a looker-glass that is so fearless as its face is ugly. One night, while twenty or thirty last gentlemen were standing at the front lobby of the house, an individual rode up to the door on little Rosinante, and, with a quick look at the looker-glass, mistook his own eyes for looked upon. Leaping from his phantom steed the equestrian said, turning to the hostler,

"Here, John, give my horse some water."

"Sir?" said John, with a look of astonishment.

"Give my horse some water!" thundered the stranger.

"Your horse!" ejaculated John, with more surprise.

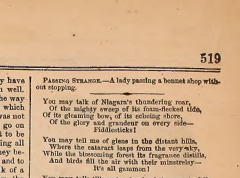
"Yes, you fool, my horse!" said the stranger, looking savagely at John.

John walked toward him to ignore the would demand an explanation, and took down on the step, when he suddenly stopped like one surprised beyond expression.

"Bless my soul!" said he, "I ask your pardon, Sir; but your animal stood on a line with that looking-glass, and I didn't see him."

The owner of the spectral beast tried to frown, but a tear from the looker may made him change his mind.

PASSING STRANGE.—A lady passing a bonnet shop without stopping.



You may talk of Niagara's thundering roar,
Of the mighty sweep of its foam-flecked tide,
Of its gleaming bow, of its echoing shore,
Of the glory and grandeur on every side—
Fiddlesticks!

You may tell me of pines in the distant hills,
Where the sunset leaps from the western sky,
While the blooming forest its fragrance distills,
And the soft air the sir with their minstrelsy—
It's all gammon!

You may talk till you're dumb of these waterfalls,
Where nymphs and naiads perchance may dwell;
But I know a place where four bits walk
Contain another I like as well—
And better too! Just listen.

Oh, the gushing clusters of dancing curls,
Where rosy Cupids may bask in glee,
On the banks of lovely looping girls!
Oh, them's the waterfalls for me!

AND THEM'S HIM!

THEOLOGICAL HOROLOGY.

There's this to say about the Welch,
So bother bannocks, brose, and bicks;
They don't pretend to depict Watch,
For Calvinists despise good works.

IN New Zealand the boys swim rivers and climb hills for the sake of going to school. In this vicinity they frequently stay away from school to swim rivers and climb hills.

What beams often fall on men's backs without hurting them?—Sunbeams.

Why is an astræa waiter like a race-horse?—Because it runs for the plate.

A POWERFUL BUSTER.—"I say, Mr. Johnson, did you hear 'bout de catalepsy dat befell Phillies?" "Of course I didn't—what was it?" "Why, he was de doctor ordered a blister on her chist; well, as she hadn't no chist, no how, she jist pit it on de butcher, and it burned her nice pink bonnet out de shape, and spile un entirely."

What is that which every one wishes to possess, and which every one wishes to get rid of as soon as they have got it?—A good appetite.

A man behind the times is apt to speak ill of them. Probably they don't look well from behind.

A young and gallant captain, on receiving a note from a lady "requesting the pleasure of his company" at a party to be given at her house on the evening designated, took his men and marched them to the young lady's residence. When it was explained to him that it was himself alone who had been invited, he said, "By Jove, the letter said company, and I thought the lady wanted to see all my boys!"

A French gentleman who was caressing a dog one day remarked, "I love the dog, he eats, he sleeps, he digs, in short any thing vat is beastly."

The officiating clergyman at the marriage of a deaf and dumb couple wittily and gallantly wished them empeaksable bliss.

OLD RELICS.

BY AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

A WILD, wet night! The driving sleet
Blurs all the lamps along the quay;
The windows shake; the busy street
Is yet alive with hurrying feet;
The wind raves from the sea!

So let it rave! My lamp burns bright;
My long day's work is almost done;
I curtain out each sound and sight—
Of all nights in the year, to-night
I choose to be alone.

Alone, with doors and windows fast,
Before my open desk I stand—
Alas! can twelve long months be past,
My hidden, lifelong wealth, since last
I held thee in my hand?

So, there it lies! From year to year
I see the ribbon change; the page
Turn yellower; and the very tear
That blots the writing, grow clear
And fade away with age!

Mine eyes grow dim when they behold
The precious trifles hoarded there—
A ring of golden hair, I wold
A withered harebell, and a fold
Of sunny chestnut hair.

Not all the riches of the earth,
Could buy me back the treasures I own my hearth;
And yet the secret of their worth
Must live and die with me.

THE FIT OF ALISIE'S SHOE.

On a certain mellow August afternoon an old woman was sitting in the kitchen of Jamie's, a little cottage smothered in fuchsia-trees.

"God save all here!" said the visitor, pushing in her head at the door. "An' is this Jamie MacQuillan's?"

"As sure as my name's Jamie," said the weakly man, taking off his spectacles. "Take a seat, ma'am. You'd be a thraveler maybe, comin' home from the fair?"

The old woman had dropped into a chair, panting with fatigue.

"It 's no shame for ye," she gasped, "that ye don't know me, seein' that ye never set eyes on me before; but I'm wan o' the M'Cumbridges, from beyond Loughgill, an' I 'm a walked every foot of the road to see you an' yours."

"Why, you don't name to say that?" cried Jamie, his pale face lighting up. "You don't mane to say you're Shaun M'Cambridge's sister Penny, own cousin to my father's second wife, that was to have stood for our Alisie at her christenin', only she took a pain in her heal and couldn't stir from home? Faith, an' I might have known you by the fine look o' your nose, always an' ever the sign o' the rale ould blood. Throth that same blood's thicker nor wather! Mary, mavourneen, it's Penny M'Cumbridge, from Lough Neagh side!"

A great head-shaking followed this speech, and then the visitor began to explain for Alisie, her goddaughter that was to have been, only for the unfortunate pain in the heal.

"Wait a bit, wait a bit," said the father; "she'll be in from the fair by-an'-by, an' then if ye don't give her the name of her godmother girl and her namesig-r that ever stepped about a house, I'll give ye lave to go back to Lough Neagh an' spend the rest o' your days waitin' for her acquials."

"Whisht, Jamie," said the mother; "self praise is no praise, no more is praise o' yer own flesh an' blood. All I 'll say is, that while Alisie was in the cousin Penny the cup o' tay after her thravels. She was to bring a name but yet green from Minther M'Shane's, in Portrush, as well as all the news from Castle Craigie, an' of the doin's of ould Lady Betty MacQuillan, that has the power to her!"

"Is that the ould lady that's come home from Ingia!" asked she who was called Penny M'Cambridge.

"Ay, sy," said the wife of Jamie, eagerly. "I've passed through Portrush, an' 'yell maybe have the throw-away with the tay-cup in the sass, that are they saying in the town?"

"Well, you see, Mary Kenny, "bein' a sthranger, and spakin' to few, I heard but little. But they do say that her husband was the last of the MacQuillains of Castle Craigie, an' that as she has no child of her own, all the MacQuillans in the country are claimin' kin with her, an' fightin' among them about who 'll be her heir."

"An' is that all ye know, Penny dear?" said Mary. "Why, I have more nor that myself. Sure she's written a letther all round to every MacQuillan o' them all, biddin' them to a grand house-warnin' on Wesday next, an' sure the whole town 'll saddle it all an' name who's to come after her. An' though she's in London now, she'll be at Castle Craigie afore it seen since the day Sir Archie MacQuillan brought home his fairy bride, an' then it wasn't paisters an' brickla yers, but the 'good people' themselves that laid hand to the work."

"She must be a queer sort of a body," said Penny. "But I hope, Jamie, that you, as Alisie's man, an' as good a MacQuillan as ever a wan among them, I hope you haven't been shy of seedin' in your claim."

"There's richer nor us, and there's poorer, but we're not so mane yet as to go crawin' for what we're not likely to get. It's not to MacQuillans like us that Lady Betty has sent her invite."

All the three pair of eyes were now turned to the doorway, whose sunny space was obscured for a moment by a pretty a figure as any lover of fresh and pleasant sights could wish to see. This was a ripe, flexed, dark-haired, country girl, with her coarse straw-bonnet tipped over her forehead to save her eyes from the sun, and her neat print gown tucked tidily up over her white petticoat.

"Come in, Alisie!" cried Jamie, "come in an' see your cousin, Penny M'Cambridge, from Lough Neagh side, that was to have been your godmother, an' has come every fut o' the road from that to this to see what sort Mary has turned out."

"An' now you'll tell us the news, Alisie," said Mary the mother. "What's doin' an' sayin' in Portrush ahout Lady Betty?"

"Oh throth, mother!" said Alisie, tossing her head, "throth I'm sick, sore, an' tired, heatin' in the quare ole house she's pulled down to her sack, poor body! Sich greasin' an' compairin' you never heard since the day you were born. The whole town was MacQuillan, wan frien's or another, at it bank an' fast for which 'll have the best chance o' comin' in for the ould lady's fortune. An' sich preparations! Mrs. Quinn, the housekeeper, took me all through the castle to see the new grandoor; an' such curtains, an' chairs, an' a big looking-glass, an' sich lookin'-glasses! feth, when I went to the dhrawin-room door, I thought I'd gone crazy, for half a dozen other Alisies stepped up in the corners an' all over the walls, an' come to meet me with their baskets on their arms. I'm in the sarvice for all this, said I, an' if they hadn't put her an' themselves her to it, she would never be for doin' the quare thing she's goin' to do on Wesday night. An' what do you think she is goin' to do, father?" said Alisie, turning to Jamie, "but she's to have a tay-cake made, an' sent in in it, an' every MacQuillan at the feast gets a piece o' the cake, an' whoever finds the ring, as sure as he's there he's to have it, an' he's to be Lady Betty's fortune, an' come after her in Castle Craigie!"

Here Mary the mother began to groan and rock herself, and some of the cheerfulness left Penny's face. It would not stretch out their hands for a piece of that lucky cake, when it might be theirs for the asking. Jamie was getting very red in the face, and was observing his paper very fiercely, when Penny, who had been laughing, wiped away a tear and looked up. Then the others took back hand with her kinsfolk, and trotted away down the lonan as she had come.

It was a gay and pleasant scene at this final Alisie was sitting on the end of the kitchen-table, reading the newspaper to her father.

"Ay-e—ay," said Jamie, stumbling at a word, y i—vi, g a—ga— Och, my blessin' to the word, I can't make head or tail o't. Ye'll read it bether yerself, father, an' it's time I was goin' down to Jane, any how!"

Alisie," said Jamie, putting his spectacles, in a fearful way, over the room out a bad dark after all the throuble Minther Dewish has taken wi' you. Ye'r gettin' a big woman, Alisie, an' there's not a thing to'r bad at but the clarkin'. Go off to school now this very evenin' an' give my respects to Hughie Dewish, an' tell him I'll be obliged to him to spell navigation afore you come back."

Alisie colored, and her thick black lashes rested on her round cheeks a while she took off her bonnet and kneaded the wet meal for the hens with her spare hands. But as she left the house she looked back with a smile a little too full of fun for Jamie.

"Then you an' Hughie Devnish may put it out o' yer hands that ye'll ever make a clark o' Alisie," she said; "for ye may be sure I'll make a one of the larnin'-books that ever cracked a schoolmaster's skull, an' feel me not be the better for it. An' mind ye learn ye wouldn't have her wan bit the larnder at the hinder end!"

So saying she stepped out into the sun, and was busy feeding her hens under the shelter of the golden haycock, when she saw a servant in a showy livery coming trolling up the lonan.

"Can you tell me where Miss MacQuillan lives about here, my good girl?" he asked, with a supercilious glance at Alisie's working dress.

"No," said Alisie, looking at him with her head thrown back. "That's Jamie MacQuillan's house" pointing to the gable-end. "He 's a MacQuillan, Alisie, but there's no Miss MacQuillan here; none nearer by this road nor Belly Scuffling."

"I beg your pardon, miss," said the man, with an altered manner, "but I believe this must be for you." And then he rode off, leaving her standing staring at a dainty pink note which she held by one corner between two mealy fingers. "Miss Alisie MacQuillan," said the ink on the back of the narrow envelope, "Castle Craigie."

"That's me!" said Alisie with a gasp. "The name o' them's all writ down in the big book at the ministys. An', as struse as I'm a livin' girl, it's the Castle Craigie liveries you fine fellow was dressed up so grand in! Here's the Castle Craigie crest on this purty little seal."

It was a note of invitation to Lady Betty's ball, and, in spite of her humble station in life, Alisie had to read it, spelling it out word after word, turning it back and forward and upside-down, and feeling sure all the time that she was making a fool of herself on her by writing to Lady Betty in her name. She sat on a stone and thought this terrible matter out, then all the while burning her cheeks and making them more and more outh to appear in a ball-room.

"An' she thinks I'm some fine young lady in a low neck an' satin shoes, waitin' all ready to step into her ball-room an' make her a courtesy. Good luck to her! What 'd she say if she heard Alisie's brogues haunnerin' away on yon fine slippy floor o' hers?" And Alisie, as she spoke, stamped on the roughest foot and kicked at it critically. "Then thank you, Lady Betty! but I'm not goin' to make myself a 'nghin'-stook for the country yet!"

"Who came ridin' up the lonan a bit ago, Ailsie?" said the mother, when she went in with the note safely hidden in her pocket.

"Ridin' up the lonan is it?" said Alisie.

"Ay, sy," said Mary, "I thought I heard a barse's fut on the road, but it be to been yer father smirin'."

"Me smirin'!" cried Jamie, starting and rubbing his eyes. "Ivy dhramin' yersel, Mary. Alisie, ye witch, are ye not gone to school yet?"

"Well, I'll go, father," said Alisie. "Mayhe," she thought, "Hughie 'll tell me what to do with that letter afore I come back."

"Where's your word, Alisie MacQuillan?" asked the schoolmaster, taking her book with a severe and business-like air, as she entered the school-room.

"Invitation, Sir—navigation, I mane," said Alisie, demurely, studying her folded hands.

The master looked very haughty, and afterward frowned severely, when, on going the rounds of the desks, he found Miss Betty MacQuillan, "Castle Craigie," and other foolish and meaningless words, scrawled profusely over the page which was to have been scored in navigation alone. Alisie was "kept in" for bad conduct, and locked up alone in the school after the other pupils had gone home. But when the schoolmaster came to release her, she was found plucking the roses that hung in at the window, and sticking them in the holes that had been made for hanging the desks. A crumpled note lay open before her.

She should hardly have said the schoolmaster came in, for, instead of Hughie Devnish, he appeared in a new character. This punished girl was his wildest and least creditable pupil, and yet, when she walked up to the bar of disgrace, he was trembling and blushing like his own youngest "schoolma'am" at home. He took up the note, looked at the crumpled note, and he picked it up and read it.

"I guessed how 'twas," he said, "but you're nately to thinkin' of going."

Now Alisie had intended to ask his advice, but the mischief that was in her would come out.

"Sir, I wouldn't not go as well as another?" she asked, pettishly.

"Arroon, you know I would not like it," he said. "An' then it's not proper," said Alisie, tossing her head, and beginning to pick a rose to pieces.

"Alisie," said the young man, vehemently, "I was only the other day thinking I'd ask you that very question. No matter what it came of," said Hughie; "you promise me, and I'll do the same promise me as well that you wouldn't go thrustin' yourself among these people that would only laugh at you for your pains."

"I don't know why you should think I'd be laughed at," said Alisie, "barrin' you're ashamed o' me!"

The schoolmaster's face blazed up, and with all his heart in his love he told her of where she sat with her ripe face half-turned from the sun coming through the lattice, and her dark head framed in the roses.

"Ashamed o' you, mavourneen?" he said, tenderly. "No; but there might be some there that we wouldn't like to see you among, and that's dared an' unprotected. MacQuillan o' the Reek—"

"I slapped his face sore!" cried Alisie, firing up again, "an' it's not a lady he'll come anin' me to do 't again."

"And then 'll be others there," he went on, that 'd fall in love wi' you, maybe, an' snatch you up from Hughie before he has enough earned to marry you and keep you."

"An' what if they did?" said Alisie, with wicked coolness.

"What if they did?" repeated Devnish, slowly, looking at her with a pained, appealing look, as if expecting her to retract the cruel words. "I tell you what it is, Alisie," he broke out, passionately, drawing his left hand from its concealment, "I believe it's this that's workin' at the bottom o' all your coldness. I'm still already of a deformed lover. Go to Lady Betty's ball then, an' find a husband for yourself that you'll not be ashamed of. I'll not."

Just as Alisie was getting pale and the tears began to rise under her long dark lashes, and the Widow Devnish came into the school-room and called Hughie to supper.

The next evening bright Alisie was dressed out in a yellow silk skirt and cherry-colored bodice, with a fine pair of stockings of Mary's own knitting, and shoes borrowed from the sides. The Mucklehorn, of the Windy Gap, was to take her to Castle Craigie in his new spring-cart.

As her cousin stood to set her down at a little distance from the entrance gates, out and in of which the carriages were rolling at such a rate as would have Alisie's heart thump against her side till it was like to burst through Pat the weaver's tabinet.

She arrived at the ball-room just in time to see a flash of crystals and white robes float gracefully over the threshold, and the absurdity of her own costume came over her in its terrible reality. Covered with confusion she looked about to see if she could escape among the trees, and hide there till morning; but one of the grand servants had espied her, and under his eyes Alisie scorned to beat a retreat.

"What is your business here, young woman?" asked this awful person, as she stepped into the glare of the hall lights.

"I am one of Lady Betty's guests," said Alisie, lifting her head. But a horrible tittering greeted this announcement, and a crowd of other servants, who were all vying her curiously from head to foot.

A servant at length conducted Alisie to the ball-room. He opened the door wide, and Alisie herself swallowed up in a blaze of light and color, with a hum in her ears as of a thousand bees all buzzing round her head at once. When she recovered from her first stunned sensation, and regained consciousness of her own identity, she found herself seated side by side with the five Miss MacQuillans from Bally Scuffling, all dressed in their grass-colored satin, all with their noses redder than ever, all eying her askance from their corner to her brooches, and tittering just as the servants had done in the hall.

A band was playing, and a crowd of people were dancing, but it seemed to Alisie, whenever she looked up, that nobody had got ready to ask her to dance to stare at her. When she saw the elegant slippers of the dancers she was afraid to stir lest the "navigation" in her shoes should be heard all over the room; and when MacQuillan of the Reek came up to her, and, making a low bow, begged the honor of dancing with her, Alisie's ears began to sing with confusion, and her teeth to chatter with fright. But as she did not know how to refuse, she got up and accompanied him to where there was an empty space on the floor. The band was playing a lively air in quick time, and Alisie, thinking any thing better than standing still, set to dancing her familiar jig with energy. She had once slapped this gentleman's face for his impertinence, and she believed that he had now led her out to avenge himself for her confusion. So Alisie danced her jig, and finding the clatter of her tongues was drowned by the music, she gained courage and looked round with interest, and met with encouraged laughter, till the lookers-on cried "Brava!" and the laugh was turned against MacQuillan of the Reek, who, after all, very good-naturedly, had made him her courtesy, and allowed him to take her back again to the Bally Scuffling maidens, who had not danced at all, and who held up their fans to fence before their five faces in disgust at Alisie's performance.

A magic word, supper, acted like a charm on all there. The crowd thinned and disappeared, and nobody noticed Alisie. Every gentleman had his own partner to attend to, and as no one knew the little peasant girl, Alisie was very glad, for she would rather endure hunger than be laughed at. She was just beginning to feel sadly, when in came MacQuillan of the Reek, saying that Lady Betty had sent him to conduct her to the supper-room.

Lady Betty was sitting at the head of the most distant table, and Alisie took in her hand a huge cake before her. The more substantial eatables seemed to have been already discussed, for every guest had a slice of this cake on a plate before him or her. They were nibbling it, and mincing it up with knives. All were silent, and all looked remarkable and distasteful. Alisie thought the silence and the dissatisfaction was all on account of her audacious presence.

"This way!" said Lady Betty MacQuillan, in a voice that made Alisie start, and the august hostess beamed upon her last side for out-blushing herself. The wax-lights blazed on Lady Betty's golden turban, and Alisie did not dare to look at her face, though she thought Lady Betty with the long bright helped her to a small cut of the wonderful cake. Alisie was very hungry, and the cake was very sweet. She devoured a few morsels eagerly; then she ceased eating.

"Why don't you eat, child?" said Lady Betty, in a voice that made Alisie start; and this time she ventured to look up.

She looked up, and stared at her. A cloak had opened down the front. There was a little white-and yellow face, with twinkling black eyes, looking down on her—a face that she had seen before. It was Penny M'Cambridge, from Lough Neagh side, who was to have been her godmother only for the unfortunate pain in her heal, who was stiffly dressed up in purple velvet and a cloth of gold turban. Oh, murther! What would be the end of this? Penny M'Cambridge telling all the grandeyed folks of the country round, pretending to be the lady of Castle Craigie! Or, stay! Whether was Penny M'Cambridge acting Lady Betty MacQuillan, or had Lady Betty MacQuillan been acting Penny M'Cambridge?

"Why don't you eat, child?" repeated Lady Betty, as Alisie sat turning her piece of cake about on her plate.

"I 'm hungry enough," said Alisie, "but I can not ate this, my lady, barrin' you want me to choke myself!"

And Alisie held up her bit of cake in which was wedged the ring that declared her the heiress of Castle Craigie.

Well, I need not tell how after supper some of the guests who were spiteful ordered their carriages and whirled away in disgust; how others, who were not spiteful, staid and danced the morning in; how some, who were good-natured, congratulated Alisie on her good luck; how others, who were quite the reverse, yet fawned on the bewildered heroine of the evening. Her head was turned by the flattery, and Lady Betty all the rest of the time; how, in the end, she was conducted to a splendid bed-chamber, where she was frightened out of her senses at the grandeur of the furniture, and could not get a wink of sleep for the softness of the bounty bed.

The news was not long in traveling over the country, and next day, when a carriage dashed up to the door of Jamie's cottage, Jamie and his wife thought they were prepared to receive their fortunate daughter with dignity. But when Alisie walked in to them in a white pelisse and spangled slippers, her bonnie dark eyes looking sat at them from under the shade of a pink satin hat and feathers, the delusion of theirs was dispelled. Mary's exultation knew no bounds, and Jamie said, "Can this fine lady be my daughter?" nervously, and with tears in his eyes. And Alisie sat on a chair in the middle of the floor she had swept so often, and pulled off her fine hat, and threw it to the furthest corner of the kitchen, rowing she would never leave her father and mother to go and live with Lady Betty. And Lady Betty, who was present, was not a bit angry, although the beautiful hat was spoiled; but began telling how she would educate Alisie, and take her to see the distant world, and how she would dress her like a princess, and marry her to some grand gentleman, who should either bear the name of MacQuillan, or adopt it.

Then Alisie's heart seemed to break with one loud sob, and she rushed out of the cottage and down the lonan, bareheaded and weeping. Midway she stopped on the road, and, pulling off one of her pretty shoes, she flung it from her with all her might till it struck the trunk of a far tree growing on the hill that led to Hughie's.

"That's the slipper to you, for good luck, Hughie Dervish!" she said; "an' if ever I forget you to marry a fine gentleman, may the last bit I ever put my gowns into rage again, an' the bit that I ate into sand in my mouth!"

So Alisie said good-by to home. The next day Lady Betty and Miss MacQuillan departed from Castle Craigie for the Continent, where Lady Betty intended to finish Alisie's education and accomplishments.

Four years passed away, and Jamie and Mary had grown accustomed to their improved circumstances. Lady Betty having proved as good as her word in bestowing on them all those benefits which she had enumerated when coaxing Alisie away with her. Whether they were quite satisfied with the fresh benefits thus forced with them, they themselves knew best. When a neighbor went in to see them, Mary had always some grand talk about "my daughter, Miss MacQuillan;" but the Widow Dervish often shook her head, saying they were dull enough when nobody was by, and feared Alisie had forgotten them.

Alisie's education being finished, Lady Betty at her best as an accomplished marriage for her favorite. She introduced her to society in Paris, and saw her making conquests right and left at the most fashionable balls given to the Continental Allies. Alisie's sparkling eyes were enchantingly foiled by her diamonds, and proposals in plenty were laid at her feet. But Alisie, though enjoying right merrily the homage so freely paid her, only laughed at the offers of marriage, as though it were quite impossible to regard such a trifling thing but as mere very capital jokes. Lady Betty did not join in this view of the matter, but she had patience with her protégée for a considerable time, as Alisie always milked her displeasure by saying, on her refusal of each "good match," "I will marry a better man still, Lady Betty."

After four years, Lady Betty, who was a willful old lady, and very much used to have everything prepared with her about it, and before she recovered her temper she took ill and died, and Alisie found herself one day all alone and solitary in Paris, without the protection of her kind indulgent friend.

Tears would not mend the matter now, nor would they shake the dead Lady Betty back to life; so, having her, the conditions of which were fair enough, said Alisie's suitors, when the contents of the important document became known. One was the impatient old lady given her chosen heiress, in the space of time she chose to become a wife. And at the end of that year she was still found to be a spinster, not a penny bad she, but might go back to the cottage on the top of the lonan, and talk with her her father and mother to work for them as before, to milk her cows, and feed her bees; and persuade herself, if she liked, that her silk and her diamonds, and her beauty, and her lovers, had all had their existence in a tantalizing dream, which had visited her during the morning-time in the evening and cock-crow of a charming morning. But, should she remain single, then the year was not over before her husband the name of MacQuillan, then would the shade of Lady Betty be appeased, and the Indies thousand pounds, the gift of that Irish female, lord the old ancestral halls of Castle Craigie, would all belong to Alisie and the fortunate possessor of her wealthy hand.

Very fair conditions, said the suitors, and propositions poured in on Alisie. But lo and behold! the flint-hearted maiden proved as obstinate as ever; and, in the midst of wonderment and disappointment, having attained the age of twenty-one, and being altogether her own mistress, she wrote to her retainers at Castle Craigie to announce her arrival there upon a certain day. Great was the joy and glory of Mary MacQuillan when she received a letter from her daughter, desiring that her father and mother should come to take up their abode at the castle, being there to receive her at her arrival. Great indeed was her triumph when Miss O'Trinmine and many a score of lovers with cards, and a lace cap with lappets, in which to meet her child, and when Jamie's blue coat with the bright gold buttons came out.

Alisie brought a whole horde of foreigners with her, brilliant ladies of rank, who called her pet and darling in broken English—and many gentlemen—and counts with slender names, who were sweethearts, very sentimental persons, and still more with the Irish charmer. Balls, plays, and sports of all kinds went on at the Castle, and those of the gentry—Alisie, from curiosity, or a latent regard, came to visit Alisie, found her in the midst of a roomful of glittering company, dressed in a blue satin sack and pearl ear-rings, with her hair coming into her eyes in very bewitching little tendril curls, and seated between Mary in the brown velvet and lappets, and a dress of the new cut on the left elbow. They went away saying she was wonderful indeed, considering delightfully old and pretty, and they wondered which of those flaunting foreigners she was going to marry in the end. Meantime the year was flying away, and old neighbors of her mother's began to shake their heads over the fire, of nights, and to say that if Alisie did not take care she might be a penniless lass yet.

Things were in this position when, one fine morning, Miss MacQuillan, driving out with some of her grand friends, thought proper to stop at the door of Hughie Dervish's school-house. The schoolmaster turned red and then pale as he saw Alisie's feathers coming nodding in to him through the doorway, followed by a brilliant party of grandees, and two footmen dragging a huge parcel of presents for his girls and boys. Alisie coolly set her ladies and gentlemen unpacking the parcel and distributing its contents, while she questioned the schoolmaster upon many subjects on this the air of a little duchess, whose humor it was to make inquiries, and who never, certainly, had seen that place, much less conversed with that person before.

Hughie endured her whim with great patience, till, just before the party left, he begged he desk to restore a book to its place, she demanded to see a certain little dark thing which was peeping out from under some papers. Then, with a silent emergency, he produced a little black kid shoe. So the story runs:

"Why, it's only a slipper!" said Alisie, turning it about and looking at it just as the Widow Dervish had defended Hughie by doing. "What on old thing to keep a shoe in a desk! But it looked like the cover of a book. Good-morning!"

As the party drove off in that one of the gentlemen remarked that the schoolmaster was a fine-looking, intelligent fellow, fit for a better station than that which he filled. And it is further said that next day Alisie made a present to this gentleman of a snuff-box worth a hundred guineas.

When Alisie returned to her own dear return home on this August afternoon, she walked over to the pretty old casket which contained her tabby, a handsome gold casket which was a little kid slipper which looked as if she must have stolen it out of Hughie's desk. It was the very slipper which she had flung at him on that never-to-be-forgotten day.

One day the lady of the castle sent a message to the schoolmaster (who had meanwhile taken to and picked up a few pretty words), from the host, and must beg them to excuse her absence from among them for the rest of the day.

It was on this very evening that Hughie Dervish was walking up and down his school-room floor, musing, when Jamie, the schoolmaster's son, his enduring in the future to have Alisie coming into the school at any hour she pleased, to play the mischief with the children, and to be a heartsore among his boys and girls. He had just come to the point of resolving to give up his labors here, and to go off to the Indies, or to Australia, when click! went the latch of the door, and (of course, thinks he, it must be a dream) in walked Alisie. Not the lady Beautiful of the drawing-room, all gown and nodding feathers, but the veritable old Alisie, in her shabby old bonnet and cloak, cotton dress, brogues, straw-bonnet tipped over her nose, and all (where on earth did she get them?) in which she had left the place on that first after August evening, of which this was the anniversary, when she had shown him her invitation to Lady Betty's ball.

Now the gloaming was just putting out the glare of the sunset behind the latticed windows, and when Hughie had persuaded himself that he was not dreaming at all he next became very sure that he had gone out of his senses with trouble, and that he was looking at an object created by Alisie his eyes by his own diseased imagination. However, the apparition spoke, and Hughie knew that it approached, and sitting down on the end of one of the forms it displayed a paper which it unfolded in its hands—hands that were not those of a lady, and making the only difference between this and the old Alisie.

"I've got a letther here, Misther Dervish," said Alisie's old voice, speaking with Alisie's old brogue, and in the sly, mischievous tone that Hughie remembered well as a boy, "an' I'm afeard I don't aiswer it for me. I'm a bad clark myself, 'a know."

Not knowing what to say to be he took the letter out of the hands of the apparition, and, at the proposal of marriage from Alisie's old tormentor, MacQuillan burst out laughing.

The schoolmaster was trembling, you may believe, with many confused ideas and sensations when he finished the letter, and looked up, but he inked his pen manfully, and produced a sheet of paper, then sat waiting with much patience for his visitor's reply. She, for her part, sat with her two eyes upon the floor, and so there was a cruel pause.

"Well," says Hughie at last, with a bewitched feeling, as if he were talking to Alisie herself of old days, "what am I to say in the answer?"

"Fath I don't know," says Alisie.

"But what am I going to give?" asked Hughie, striving, we are assured, to command himself.

"Am I to have the letther or the letter?"

"I tell ye I don't know, Hughie Dervish," said Alisie, crossly. "I gave a promise to another, so he never fired from the beginning. Do I 'lieve ye'll know best what to put in the letther versel."

"Alisie!" cried Hughie, rising to his feet, "did you come here for a thing but to drive me mad with your airs? Or, avourneen, is it possible you would marry me yet?"

"Fath it is, Hughie," said Alisie.

And after the letter was written they went in and had tea with the Widow Dervish.

The next morning Miss MacQuillan appeared among her guests as if nothing had happened, but before night a whisper flew from ear to ear that the heiress was engaged, while the lady herself did not contradict the report. Every man looked darkly at his neighbor, and "Who is he?" was the question on every lip. At last it is said, in a most noble dream, that one of the party took heart of grace and "It is not I," said the others, one by one, and followed his example; and by-and-by Alisie was left peacefully in possession of her castle; whereupon there was a quiet wedding, at which Mary, Jamie, and the Widow Dervish were the only guests.

A nine days' wonder expires on the tenth, and after a week or two Hughie Dervish MacQuillan, Esq., was looked upon as no despicable person by many who thought it their duty to sneer on his wedding-day.

THE HAUNTING PAST.

He came to-day. He brought his bride;
And through the wood they went with me—
We passed them, silent, trysting tree;
I saw him turn his head aside.

And wondered if his glance would fall
On letters carved by him of yore,
In days that he regrets no more—
That I with burning thoughts recall.

The golden Past, that haunts me yet,
Whose faded glory no gleam can bring to bliss
Like twilight distance, cold and dim—
Oh, strange it is we hem forget!

Yet through those hours my will was strong
To school my heart to stifle pain—
To hide the throbbing, to endure again!
But night came, though the day was long.

Night came; they went. His farewell tone
Rings in my ear. 'Twill be the last!
My heart's fierce ordeal is past;
Beneath the stars I stand alone.

GREATNESS OF MIND.—The President of A——— was arrested at Ale during the reign of Robespierre. Upon being interrogated as to the number of hogsheads of claret he had concealed in his cellar, he replied that he had been buried by his wife, he was discharged; but, when the servant was taken up and confined, it being proved that he was privy to the transaction, he was thrown into prison, and the utmost pains taken to discover the place where this treasure was deposited, and he was threatened with the loss of his head on that account. The President himself repaired to the prison, released him from his confinement, took off his chains, and commanded him to disclose the particulars of the transaction. "Sir," answered the honest domestic, "your refusal is followed." When I was intrusted with the secret both by my wife and master, I thought it would be unjust and improper to confide it to you, and my firmness will here afford you matter for admiration." Having said this he walked forward to the scaffold, prepared for the stroke, and was immediately executed.

INTERESTING DISCOVERY AT POMPEII.—Abundant details have been received from Naples respecting the freshly uncovered Temple of Isis at Pompeii, and the extraordinary finds in Pompeii. Three hundred skeletons were found crowded within that edifice, whose extraordinary sacrifice being evidently held in the hour they were overwhelmed. The statue of Isis (the goddess of Egypt) remains intact, but tripod in front of the altar, the golden censer, the jewels on the person of the priestess, the vessels holding a deposit of animal blood, are the main particulars dwelt on, no chapter in the history of the buried city could be more interesting. The eyes of Jove were of the most vivid emerald, and six wonderful statuettes richly decorated with gold trinkets, her gravity bird resplendent with a cluster of glittering gems, and numerous articles were enclosed within the censer, while gorgeous lamps and bronze ornaments stood on the altar's pavements.

THE SMOOTH FOOT-TIME planted a thousand years ago by the Emperor Charlemagne, in honor of the eastern wall of the cathedral at Hildersheim, has been in particularly good condition, and the trees look fresher and greener than ever. Two shoots, which sprung up from the knotty mid-musical root of the tree in 1865, have attained already the height of the roof.

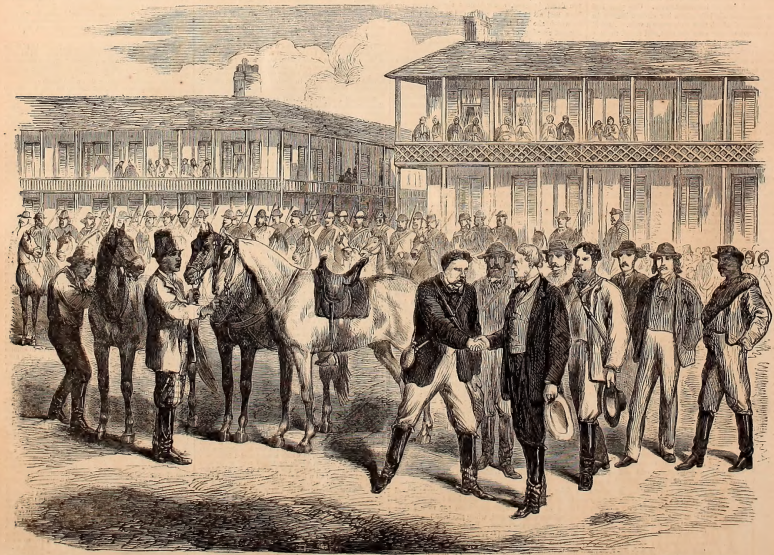
SINGULAR REMEMBRANCE.—It is no new thing to say that twins are more known to the actuated by the same impulses, tastes, and desires, but it is a rare thing to hear this asserted of a set of twins of the kind, however, occurred in a French Court of Justice quite recently. Four children, Arthur Bernard, Jules Bernard, Adolphe Bernard, aged thirteen, and two twin brothers, aged eleven years and six months, were brought before the magistrate for stealing sundry articles from the stalls on which they were exhibited. Each of the four prisoners, on being interrogated, gave the same answer to the question, "Why did you steal?" "I was hungry." The whole of the twins had been without employment for some months, and, as their parents, all of them honest workpeople, begged the magistrate to give them up to them, and not to send them to a house of correction. The mother of the twins made the following curious observation concerning them: "My two children are twins, and, strange to say, whatever one does the other does also. If one is hungry, the other is; the same holds, the same thoughts, good or bad; they are not sisters, but brothers; yet they have been born after each follows him. Since last January we have kept them shut up indoors from fear of the cholera, and they never played in the streets, and getting into mischief. My husband had no work to employ them at, for we had found out that they had robbed us of some small coins which happened to be left lying, and, as we had not much to lose, we had not had thefts out of doors. We sent them to the national school, but, as they could not have got on there, for the several months' boy nearest Persin corrupted one of them, and the rest followed his example." The magistrate said: "You say," said the magistrate, "that your children are twins, and that they commit the same mischievous tricks?" "Yes, Sir; and there is a singular resemblance in their actions, inasmuch as, should one of them be punished by the other, who may be in another room, drinks also. Un the same occasion, should one put a finger in his mouth the other does likewise. If at any time one should happen to run over and fall down, the other will do the same. Finding him, for the father has only to take hold of the one, and all the rest come close to the place where the runaway may choose to be."

THE INVASION OF RUSSIA.—A French soldier who accompanied the armies of Russia concealed a small treasure at his entrance into Moscow, and returned to Paris after undertaking it with him on his return. After the defeat of Moscow he made a second visit to Russia, and found not only reopened his liberty a few years before his death. On reaching Paris he remembered his hidden treasure, and after tracing out the spot where he had hid it he went to take it away. He was successful in finding the spot, in the place of his money, a small tin box containing a letter addressed to himself. In the letter a comrade, who had mentioned at Nazare, where he might receive the as to applied, with the money, and begged that he would not suppose this was all a hoax. He went, however, to the house pointed out, and received his money, to the infinite twelve years' interest. With this sum he established a small business at Nazare, which enabled him to live comfortably; but he was never able, though he has taken some pains, to ascertain how his money was taken away and restored to him.

MEMORY OF A DEAF MAN.—Who is dead in the street, and knocked down at midnight?—The man who, when he came home broke open at midnight?—The man who has his pockets cut out and his coat spoiled in a crowd?—The rich man? No. Who adds to the misery people are laughing at him in their sleeves when they are eating his dinner?—The rich man. Who adds to his trouble by every story which he adds to his house?—The rich man; for the higher he ascends the colder is the atmosphere. A man breaks, and who suffers?—The rich stockholder and depositor. Wear blows his horn, and who trembles? Death approaches, and who dare to look him in the face?—Why, the rich man; and yet all the world envies the rich. Depend upon it, the length of your face will always be proportioned to the length of your purse. If you live in a two-story house be thankful, and not crave the loftier mansion of your neighbor. You but disclose yourself and bring your destiny by pining and repining.

ONE MINUTE wrote a strange little book in Honor of the Gout, with the avowed object of proving that it was a blessing to mankind, and should rank as the fourth cardinal. He sets about his difficult task so heartily that it is somewhat difficult to guess whether he is in earnest or satirical; and the reader is in doubt whether he should laugh at or with him. After enumerating the catalogue of his subject, as something younger than the fall of Adam, sent down from heaven indiscriminately to be a perpetual curse to man's transgression, our author proceeds to give six good reasons why gout should be ranked among the blessings of earth. Firstly, it gives a man pain without danger. Secondly, it is the most consistent companion of the friends Intill intervals, in which they experience a delicious enjoyment of health, and are known to throw to pass through life without an ailment. Thirdly, it is a perpetual weather-glass, and can tell by the state of its patient's limbs your barometers and thermometers are worthless instruments; and our gentle physician goes on to say, that in proper study studied, the time would come when no ship-owner would consider his vessel safe unless commanded by a gouty captain. Fourthly and fifthly, gouty people are unprejudiced, and honest, and invulnerable to envy; and lastly, gout is incurable. P. M. does not go so far as to assert that gout will be a permanent blessing to mankind, although it often keeps a man alive till all his friends are weary of him. He maintains that it is a proof of the power of making man proof against the shafts of death; and concludes his consistent eulogy by saying that the gout is the glorious gouty people do to the service they do to their country, and to the present book we owe it that we think we are well off, but must soon be seized the gout, and therefore deal with Death's factor, the pig-nata. "I am very glad," he concludes, "that my gout has nothing to do with the carnage of the dotter."

DEATH BY LIGHTNING.—The effects of a shock of artificial lightning on a gentleman of this city, somewhat, who is very sensitive to the electric discharge, may be here described. Professor Chauncey Grosvenor, of Geneva, from a small Leyden jar is exceedingly unpleasant to him. Some years ago he was exposed to the shock repeated numerous audience with a battery of fifteen large Leyden jars, charged by a Holtz machine. Through some unknown cause his gut he touched a wire which he had no right to touch. The shock was severe, and he fell upon the floor like a log. Here life was absolutely blotted out for a very sensible interval without any sense of pain. In regard to the unconscious returned: the recipient of the shock saw himself in the presence of a number of persons whom, with the help of them external facts, immediately convinced that he had received the battery discharge. His intellectual consciousness of his position was restored with extraordinary clearness, but he was entirely powerless. To prevent the audience from being alarmed he observed that he would like the electric device to receive a second such a shock, and that he wish had at length been fulfilled. But while making the request he was unconscious that the body presented to him was that of a number of separate pieces. The arms, the legs, the trunk, were detached from the trunk, and seemed suspended in the air. In fact, memory and sight were the only senses which were left unimpaired. Before the optic nerve was restored to healthy action. But what was only to be dwelt upon was the most absolute palsiveness of the shock; and there can not be a doubt that the sense of pain was entirely lost in the passage from life to death occurs without consciousness being in the slightest degree affected. It is an abrupt stoppage of consciousness unaccompanied by a pang.



In 1854 a trial took place in Connecticut, under the customary forms of law, between Phineas Wilson, the defendant, were Sarah Tuttle and Jacob Sexton. It appears that the plaintiff was the owner of a lot of land, which When Sarah asked for them Jacob demanded a kiss for his pay. and as the conditions had been complied with he objected it forthwith. The facts were clearly proved, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff.

"PETER" are lost in California in other ways besides the gambling-table. A very singular affair occurred in connection with the loss of one of these "Peters" in one of the mining season, and we had all pretty heavy purses. They, we know not by what means, had become the good-dust safely at the mines, it was usual, when one's purse was full, to take it to a merchant and have it "Peterized," or "coche" or hide it, only reserving a small quantity of dust into circulation. Well, a gentleman had his "Peter" explain what one occurred. Our Irish comrade had gone to the mines, and had been very successful in digging, for he since we moved our tent to a more eligible spot about a mile off. Our tent was now kept four days and nights by camping-ground, we were carefully tied our canvas to the trees, and, leaving a couple of our shoppers, when our comrade was his appearance, we left him in charge of our property and went off to the diggings. Then, like one described, under the influence of a spade and natural law others had struck gold and left to the utter detriment of the comrade, who, on his return, exclaimed, "The rascals have made me mad!" we shouted. Not he; with a few hasty strokes of his spade he had discovered a "pocket" and exclaimed Ils ne by sold deal! In a word, by one of the most extraordinary coincidences, the very spot we had left, we had, of course unknowingly, lighted our camp-fire exactly on the top of the "pocket" we kept four thousand pounds worth of gold. Something similar, but more wonderful, befell another party of Irish, who had left their tent to visit Spanish doubtoons. Finding that the weight of his treasure greatly encumbered his efforts in the mountains, the owner determined to "coche" it. Now this miner was a very poor man, and could not read or write. He intended a plan to hide his doubtoons that still a great deal for his movements. Accordingly, on one night, he carried the neighboring wood one evening, and, selecting a tree, he cut off a piece of bark, and, with his knife, made a hole about the size of a crown piece from the trunk, and then stowed away his doubtoons into this hole. He then fitted close to a nicety, he thrust his doubtoons, and over them he replaced the bit of bark. Then, with a few more appropriate performed that the most prizer eye could not detect the fracture. Now all was over with gloom, the owner went home convinced that a "coche" so original and so easy looking for his treasure could not be invented. It was safe, very; in fact so safe that, when he went to admire it the next day, he could not find it. Nor the next day, nor the next. In fine, this clever man at last gave up looking for it. Meanwhile, the rainy season came on, and now came the climax of the story, sounding, I must confess, a little incredible. The gentleman miner was digging one evening by his camp-fire brooding over his misfortune, when suddenly his spade struck a hollow substance. Going to the wood-heap near at hand, he selected a log, and with a few strokes of the axe split it in two, when a peculiar appearance about it startled him. With a wild cry he rushed to his companions, and fell down in a fit. It was the piece of the tree in which was concealed his doubtoons!

SAYINGS AND LITERATURE.—One of the anomalies of literary history is, that it has often been the case that men who have been most distinguished by their wit or invention of others to endure a more than ordinary share of misery and misfortune. Many of the most delightful and inspiring portions of literature have been written by men strong hearts have been bowed down by the heaviest misfortune. Cervantes was a prisoner and a bankrupt. It was in the gloom of a mother's grief, darkened by his own poverty, that Goldsmith poured out the charming tale of "Rasselas;" it was in the desolation of a home and feelings parted that poor Goldsmith, the vagrant of literature, sketched the brightest pictures of domestic happiness the world has ever seen. It was in the days of his darkness, and in the remembrance of his own sorrows, that Tom Hood shook all England with laughter. The unfortunate author of the Ingoldsby Legends, half the gems of English wit and humor have been thrown out by genius in its most sorrowful moments.

ARMY STATISTICS.

THE Report of the Secretary of War for the year 1864, which has been recently made public, presents some valuable statistics relating to the composition of the army. During the year ending November 1, 1864, there were raised and mustered into service:

Volunteers (white and colored) in loyal States	402,239
Volunteers colored) in rebel States	93,743
Recruits for Regular Army	13,971
Veterans re-enlisting before expiration of term of service	136,502
Drafted men, and substitutes	172,004
Total	820,749

The first draft (1863) was for 194,962 men, with fifty per cent. added. Of this number 117 failed to appear, 26,180 were exempted, 52,287 paid commutation, 26,092 furnished substitutes, and 9846 were held to service. The second draft (May 14, 1864) was for 50,367 men, with the following result:

Number reported and examined	38,861
Of these exempted for physical disability	11,446
Of these exempt for other causes	19,418
Of the drafted substitutes	3,966
Of these paid commutation	23,446
Of these held to service	4,015
	86,861

The third draft (September 19, 1864,) resulted as follows, the right of commutation by payment having been abolished:

Number reported and examined	72,492
Of these exempted for physical disability	39,332
Of these exempt for other causes	19,027
Of these furnished substitutes	13,345
Of these held to service	10,058
	72,492

Several Governors of loyal States sent agents to procure recruits in the rebel States, with very unsatisfactory results. In all, 1146 agents were appointed, and they secured 2853 recruits—not quite three recruits for one agent. The total amount paid for commutations up to the time when the system was abolished was $25,584,000. It will be seen that of the whole army of a million of men only 75,000—about one in thirteen—were drafted or substitutes, and these probably weakened rather than strengthened the army. Considerably more than nine-tenths of the numerical, and the entire actual, force of the army of the Union consisted of volunteers. The colored soldiers, on the 30th of October, 1864, numbered 101,350 men of all arms; and they had previously lost by battle, diseases, and desertions 68,178 men. Three weeks later (November 7, 1864) it stated in the Report that General Thomas had organized on the Mississippi River colored troops, and that it added that "the number of soldiers would have been larger but for the pressing need for the negroes in the quartermaster and commissary departments." The Report only enables us to guess at the nativity of the troops. The best data to be found in the statement of the death at the hospitals in the vicinity of Washington. In these, from August, 1861, to August, 1864, 32,706 men died. Of these the nativity of only 4871 is given: 4910 were born in the United States; 962 in foreign countries, as follows: Ireland, 444; Germany, 304; England, 112; Scotland, 60; France, 22; Wales, 7. These figures indicate that out of six soldiers five were born in the United States and one abroad.

The Report presents some vital statistics which could be gathered in no other way. Thus, in the first draft, 314 out of every 1000 were rejected for physical or mental disability; in the second draft, 257 out of every 1000. In France, Great Britain, and Belgium the exemptions from these causes range from 314 to 320 in 1000, showing a striking uniformity throughout the civilized world. In some States a record was kept of the height and chestmeasure of recruits, substitutes, and drafted men. The following is the result, the measurement being given in inches and decimals of inches:

	Height.	Chest.
New Hampshire	68.78	34.62
Connecticut, 1000	67.73	34.09
Massachusetts	66.74	34.83
New York	68.36	35.36
New Jersey	66.86	34.31
Pennsylvania	67.89	34.99
Delaware	66.05	33.09
Maryland	66.19	33.42
Minnesota	65.55	36.10
Kentucky	65.07	33.56
Ohio	66.64	35.79
Michigan	66.09	35.00

The average height was a trifle under 5 feet 6½ inches. The men from Michigan were the tallest, averaging 5 feet 8 inches: those from Vermont came next, averaging 5 feet 8 and an inch less. Men from Vermont had the fullest chests, followed closely by those from Minnesota and Michigan. It is noticeable that while the men from Kentucky were considerably above the average height their chests were narrowest of all.

A TRUE STORY.

MY two cousins, Charles and Frank Livingston, twenty years ago fell in love with two sisters, whose names were Mary and Florence Arden. As the progress of their love affairs has not much to do with the gist of my story, it is enough for me to say that every thing went on very satisfactorily, except that in due course, and on the same day, Mary and Florence became the wives of my two cousins, Charles and Frank respectively. Mary was the eldest sister, though at the time of their marriage she was barely nineteen, and to my mind the most taking and lovable of the two. Of course I have thought differently, and perhaps it was as well he did so.

The marriages happened in the spring of the year, and in the following autumn, much to the delight of the two ladies, it was determined that a yacht should be chartered for a few months, and the winter spent in cruising about from place to place. Their ideas chiefly pointed toward the Mediterranean, as they one and all had a great desire to visit Malta and Gibraltar, and moreover, if possible, to land in Africa. My father, I believe, thought that they might have the satisfaction of saying that they had once been there. Gibraltar was to be the first place on the list, and accordingly, after experiencing a rather rough voyage, which tested their capabilities as sailors to a considerable extent, they found themselves anchored off that huge rock. They saw all that was to be seen in the shape of the fortifications, etc., and among other places that they were taken to visit was the burying-ground set apart for strangers who were not Roman Catholics. Mary Livingston, who had been deeply affected by recollected, silent and apparently preoccupied all that day, when she first caught sight of the cemetery started, and seemed surprised. After they had looked about them, and lamented the general untidiness that prevailed, she suddenly exclaimed that all by walking to one corner of the ground more elevated than the rest, where she stopped, and, planting her foot on a certain spot, said that she was going to relate a curious dream she had had the previous night.

She dreamed, she said, first that she was lying in the cabin of the yacht sick almost unto death; that her husband and sister, standing by, seemed, by their actions and gestures, to imagine that she was dead; but though she was all this time conscious of what was taking place, yet she was utterly unable to move hand or foot, or to make any sound to attract their attention. In the second part of her dream she seemed to be carried on men's shoulders, still perfectly conscious, along the road they had just traversed, that she passed by their side into the cemetery, and that she was deposited their burden on that very spot where she then stood. A grave had been dug, apparently for her, she supposed, and she felt herself laid and turned to her last dream—alive, but motionless, and powerless to help herself in any way. The horror of her situation, as she was being lowered into the earth, seemed to give her strength, and in the act of striving to cry out she awoke. She then seemed to awake and to see that, though she had never seen the burial-ground before, or the road that led to it, yet, when she came to visit them on the day after the dream, she found that the reality was exactly like the dream.

Her husband and her friends laughed at Mary for her credulity in the matter, and ascribed the whole circumstance to indigestion. They did not, however, stay much longer in the cemetery, but returned to the yacht.

Two days afterward, and on the evening before that on which they had purposed leaving Gibraltar, Mary Livingston was seized with an ill. A doctor was at once sent for, who pronounced her attack to be a slight one of cholera, assuring her friends at the same time that there was to be under any apprehension of danger. Next day, however, her symptoms altered for the worse, and it quickly that before evening it was evident that she was sinking fast, and that no hopes could be retained of her recovery. She died in the arms of her husband, as you may imagine, was overcome with grief, but he had to stifle his feelings, and settle all things connected with the funeral. Which was obliged to take place on the evening of the very day after she died.

All, as I was told afterward, happened according to that dream of hers; she was carried along that steep road, and her grave had been dug on the very spot where she had stood, and on which she had been then full of life and beauty. But strange to say, and almost incredible, as it may appear, neither her sister rendered the circumstance of her relating her dream to them; and it was not till some six or seven months after the event, in the course of a twilight of their Yorkshire home, the memory of the stroll through the burial-ground, and the event connected with it, flashed across the mind of the widowed husband. Remorse at the thought of its being now all too late was his first feeling, and then an irrepressible longing to be doing something to rescue if his darling's dream had come true, and if she had, in reality, been buried alive. He made up his mind, while for that night, to be hurried to Gibraltar; it was with some difficulty that he obtained permission to have the grave opened, but when he had succeeded he found that his worst fears had been realized. There was no doubt left in his mind that his wife had recovered consciousness after she had been supposed by all to be dead, for the body was turned partly on one side, as if with the effort of trying to free herself from the cramp of the grave. From the date of the discovery he has never ceased to reproach himself for being in some part the cause of her death by his unwillingness to wonder how it was that the recollection of that dream of hers passed so quickly from his mind, and was not revived till so long afterward.

THE STORY OF THE GREAT MARCH:
Diary of General Sherman's Campaign through Georgia and the Carolinas.

BY
BREVET MAJOR GEORGE WARD NICHOLS,
Aid-de-Camp to General Sherman.

WITH A MAP AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

☞ Liberal terms to Soldiers and others who will act as Agents for the work.

This work is a complete, accurate, and graphic record of the wonderful campaign conducted by General Sherman through the heart of the enemy's country. Beginning with the pursuit of the rebel forces under General Hood, it traces, step by step, the subsequent proceedings of General Sherman, including the path of the main army of policies in their march from Atlanta to the sea, from Savannah to the heart of South Carolina, and thence to the capital of North Carolina; closing with the surrender of General Johnston.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACTS OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depôts, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the most confirmed skeptic and scientist to cases which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any discovery.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

SOME SAY, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that disease can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: Health fills the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of liquilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes on side of the scale, we have the disease of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYTICS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we do not tolerate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, NERVOUS STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA.

SWINE, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

This taint (HEREDITARY AND ACQUIRED), filling life with putrid misery, is, by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

(ARTHRITIS), LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, TIC DOLOUREAUX.

If there is any disease by which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. Acute and chronic pains are almost instantly relieved—enormous swellings are reduced. Cases, chronic for years—of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, leaving the Red Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It carries Spongy Gums and restores the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Sterilizes, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Blood, such as

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other difficulties of this kind, which so much disfigure the external appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Both Parties upon the female face, impending upon a diseased state of the liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of Constitution Life Syrup will correct the derangement, and remove the deposit, which it directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Liver, Prior to Long-seated Disease, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an interated or cancerous condition of that organ accompanied with burning or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD!

Produces healthy new tissue; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

16mo. Cloth, $1 25.

This work contains the most exhaustive survey of the great petroleum region that has yet appeared in print. The writer manifestly every well that has been sunk in the oil region, and records the history, progress, and present condition of each. He studied every method of boring and pumping in use, described them all, and criticises each from a scientific as well as from a practical stand-point: collected all the statistics extant on the production of oil in the various districts, and groups them so intelligently that, in certain limits, he forestalls the future of this most important branch of our mineral production and our national exports.

GEORGE N. SANDERS.

GEORGE N SANDERS, the notorious rebel who across our northern border has been so long conspiring against the Government, was born in Kentucky, which was also the native State of JEFF DAVIS. He is between forty-five and fifty years of age, and has been for many years engaged in visionary political schemes. Under PIERCE and BUCHANAN he was happy enough to gain a brief official authority. The former appointed him Navy Agent at New York, and the latter Consul to London. In 1861 he returned to this country and embraced the rebel cause. He was engaged in several schemes for increasing the rebel navy, all of which failed. His supposed connection with the plot to murder President LINCOLN, and with other infamous schemes against the peaceable citizens of the North, is too well known to require any comment. Within the last fortnight his name has again come prominently before the public. It has been reported that some dangerous fellows from the United States have been engaged in a plot for the abduction of the rebel agent. It is probable, however, as the Times remarks, that the "dangerous fellows" were only thieves who had designs on SANDERS'S silver spoons or Confederate gold chest.

HORSE-RACING AT SARATOGA.

THE second annual meeting of the Saratoga Association was the occasion of a series of horse-races the most splendid ever witnessed on this continent. Saratoga was all alive with excitement during the entire week beginning August 7. Every hotel and boarding-house and almost every private house was crowded. Imagine 1200 persons seated at dinner at the Union Hotel, a thousand at Congress Hall, and a proportionate number at the other hotels. The inn-keepers were compelled to use every sort of ingenuity to furnish room to their visitors. Who can estimate the number of bottles of Congress Water drunk in Saratoga during this exciting week, or the amount of money won or lost in betting? The weather was as favorable as could have been desired, and the racing was without precedent. We shall not attempt to record the triumphs of that magnificent horse "Kentucky," nor of her extraordinary companions in glory—proximi sed non secundi—but confine ourselves to one great fact, namely, that no contest of the kind has ever excited in the minds of the lovers of sports of the turf an equal interest with this year's races at Saratoga.

THE ASSASSINS AT FORT JEFFERSON.

THOSE of the assassins concerned in the murder of President LINCOLN who were condemned to imprisonment arrived at Dry Tortugas in the United States steamer Florida on the 25th of July. The prisoners when they went on board the Florida were ignorant of the altered destination of their journey, still supposing that they were to be confined in the Penitentiary at Albany. They expressed great disappointment at the change, but it is not unlikely that their confinement at Tortugas will be far more pleasant than would their incarceration at Albany.

Fort Jefferson extends over an area of about seven acres, and its guns command the inner harbor. This fort will during the greater part of the time be the prisoners' place of confinement. There are now five hundred and fifty persons confined here, mostly for political offenses. The island on which the fort is situated is thirteen acres in extent, and is barren and covered with sand, without any vegetation. The One Hundred and Tenth New York performs garrison duty, and Colonel HAMILTON is at the head of that regiment is commandant of the fort.

The prisoners acknowledged the justice of the sentence which condemned them to punishment, and although they claim that much of the evidence was malicious and false, they consider that, so far as the Government was concerned, they had a perfectly fair trial. It is most certain that in the infliction of its penalties against them the Government treats them far better than they deserve. Dr. MUDD, it is reported, is to act as assistant-surgeon in the fort. ARNOLD is to be made a clerk among the prisoners, and SPANGLER is to return to his trade as a carpenter. SPANGLER, it will be remembered, is the only one of the four who is not imprisoned for life. His term will be completed in six years. Thus begins the last chapter in the history of the assassination.

MILITARY OCCUPATION.

WE have received a long and most interesting letter from the interior of Alabama, from a gentleman who has studied the rebellion from its inception, and whose views of the present situation are worthy of the most careful consideration. The point that he especially urges is, that there is little danger of a renewal of the war for a century, provided that the Government is wise in the distribution of its military forces; to which we add, and in the use of them.

Our correspondent repeats and confirms the universal testimony as to the actual condition of public sentiment in the rebel region. It is precisely what every attentive observer will find confirmed by every late rebel he meets among us. A Georgian who has taken the oath of allegiance, said in a public stage-coach in New England, within a week: "Our people, Sir, are not cowed, they are overwhelmed by numbers." And although he was carefully moderate in his remarks, it was plain enough that he regarded the Government of the United States—which he invariably called "your" Government—very much as a Pole regards that of Russia.

Our Alabama correspondent says that the characteristic sentiment of our wayward sisters is this: "The war just closed has settled one thing but the material power of our enemies. It has not proved us wrong in any moral or Constitutional principle. The problem of free or slave labor, the sinfulness or pernicious character of enforced servitude, and the paramount authority of State or National Government, these are points as to our own constitution of which we will always believe that we are right, and to which we will adhere until they are settled in our favor. What though for the sake of bread we swear allegiance, it is by constraint; it is a forced oath, and we are not bound by it further than suits our convenience. Therefore our soldiers should not commit themselves in this way if they can avoid it; but whether or no, we shall hold ourselves ready to disregard such obligations, and to take advantage of the first difficulty in which our conquerors are involved.——And so sure as there is among men the decree of retribution, that day will be one of revenge no less than of Southern independence." Our correspondent then forcibly urges that the military force of the United States should remain to keep a firm hand "on those who sneak falsely, and who, by secret plots, nurse the elements of insurrection.——Conciliation, engagement, must be on hand; but the sword and the pen should mutually sustain each other."

Such is the universal testimony of all witnesses whose letters are unaffected by mad upon Union and the Government, and the copehism is inevitable. It is, that the national authority must be maintained by force of arms in the whole region lately in rebellion until the testimony is equally universal that that force may be relaxed with perfect security to the national authority. That the entire people are prostrated and exhausted there can be no doubt. That the war was prolonged by a terrible tension of every moral and material resource is beyond question. That, as a private letter from South Carolina avers, "the only struggle here now is a struggle to live," is evident. But no part of the rebel region was more utterly stranded than Virginia, none was more entirely exhausted. Yet who would withdraw the United States army from Virginia? What man in his senses would assume that, active operations in the field being over, the people of Virginia should at once be intrusted with the uncontrolled political conduct of the State? There have been several local elections in Virginia since the surrender of LEE. In almost every instance they have resulted in the choice of men who are known to hold the views stated by our Alabama correspondent. What would be the consequence of recognizing such elections? Plainly, the election by Congress of men of the WADE HAMPTON school; and by the alliance of such men with Copperheads, the Government of the United States would be in the hands of its enemies, and the first act of their power would be the repudiation of the national debt.

This is a result to be avoided at all hazards. But it can be avoided only by the action, not by the passivity, of the Government; and, to that end, the maintenance of adequate military power in the Southern States is indispensable. The disadvantages of such occupation are obvious, but not so obvious as its absolute necessity. It is very desirable that the people of Alabama and Georgia and Mississippi should immediately choose their Union men for their State officers and for representatives. But if they do not, they can not expect the country to suffer the consequences of their action. They must themselves endure them.

We do not, of course, exclude from the category of Union men all who have submitted to the inexorable rule of the rebellion. There are men in the South who do not call the United States Government "your" Government. There are men who do not say "our people," meaning rebels. There are men who do not excuse the crimes of LEE and DAVIS, of WERTZ and WINDER. There are men who were formerly opposed to abolitionism, and by their acquiescence in the Southern policy really fomented the war, yet who are, and have always been, faithful to the Union, and acquiesce in emancipation as a natural result of the war to preserve the Union. Such men, of the white race, are not many. Even now they are not strong enough nor bold enough to hold hourly friendly converse and speak collectively against rebel chiefs like WADE HAMPTON. They are not numerous enough to carry local elections. Nobody knows that they will be strong enough to control the State Conventions which are about to assemble. But until the political power of their States is indisputably in the hands, not of yesterday's rebels, but of to-day who have taken an oath which they despise, but of the true Union population, whether they were coerced into acquiescence in the rebellion or not, so long those States must be quietly held by the Government.

While all means are tried and every opportunity is given for the peaceful operation of the civil law, yet the loyal people of the State and the Union must know that the State and the country are not at the mercy of their enemies. MR. WADE HAMPTON advises his confederates not to emigrate, but to remain and attempt to achieve by political methods what military effort has failed to accomplish. The people of the United States are fools for not having surrendered to BEAUREGARD's cannon at Fort Sumter if they mean to surrender to WADE HAMPTON's oaths and votes. But if they do not mean to surrender, they must use the victory they have won so as to make his vote as futile as his sabre. This can be done in one way only: by occupying them, not offensively but firmly, and maintaining military power in every rebel State to the whole loyal population, white or colored. The loyal white population is now politically friendly to the colored; but we believe that even they will ally themselves with black patriots rather than intrust themselves to white traitors.

OUR CONTINENTAL DUTY.

GENERAL GRANT is reported to have said in FOSTER'S hearing that he did not care if Mexico or she would be driven out. Whatever GENERAL GRANT may think, it is probable that he says and thinks differently since he is a man of supreme discretion, and because he knows that the one desperate, lingering hope of the rebellion is that the United States may be induced in a foreign war to do for it what would be the rebels' opportunity. Probably no man in the country so earnestly wishes for such a war as WADE HAMPTON. But the moment if a foreign war should unhappily be forced upon us, we could not decline it, it is very important that we should prepare for it by very vague defiance and declamation. Let us fight, if our safety or our honor demand. But, for the sake of decency, let us have done with swagger.

We ventured to suggest some time since that the MONROE doctrine was popularly supposed to mean the right or the resolution of the United States to regulate the governments of this continent. But we can not see what right this Government has which every other independent Government has not. WASHINGTON's warning against entangling alliances was the sagacious advice that we should severely mind our own business, and not interpret our own business too rashly. GENERAL GRANT may be right in the time he suggested to MR. MONROE, through MR. RUSH, the declaration of a policy toward the Spanish colonies on this continent, founded upon the principle that the interest of constitutional governments every where was the interest of England; and situated as England and the Continent then were, the welfare of the British empire required the policy he pursued. A formidable and triumphant coalition of despotisms threatened free governments—of England equally and in the nature of things, but with arms; and it was imperatively necessary that those governments should be ready to withstand the shock.

It is undoubtedly true that a similar exigency would be equally menacing, and that the United States are always ready to provide for their own safety. If the various governments upon this continent choose to unite and forbid any European colonization here, they have the power of doing it. If they should decide that they will always retain a republican form, they may of course do that. If any one among them, or any combination, declare that no other form shall be tolerated, then, if the single government or the alliance be sufficiently strong, declaration can be enforced. But you, United States, as the chief power on this continent, but the people of Mexico to establish an empire, upon the ground that the immediate neighborhood of imperial institutions is threatening to a republic? Or ought we to guarantee the people of Mexico or of any neighboring country against all foreign powers, under all circumstances, and whatever provocation may have been offered?

If our safety and interest require that we regulate our neighbors, they certainly require that we absorb them, as the surest and least costly method of regulation. And if the presence of European powers upon this side of the ocean be offensive and dangerous, why is Spain suffered to hold Cuba, or England Jamaica? Abstractly, it would be difficult to prove that Mexico as a French colony would be more dangerous to our peace and security than Cuba and Jamaica as English or Spanish colonies, except that Mexico is upon the main land. If we may assume the dictatorship of the continent, we ought certainly to control the islands upon its coasts and within its waters.

President MONROE, indeed, in his message declaring what is called the Monroe Doctrine, expressly excepted "the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power." But any European purpose of "oppressing or controlling" the Governments which had declared and maintained their independence would be considered, substantially, by the United States; and "the American continents" were not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power. Now this last declaration is absolute. But suppose some of our neighbors should invite colonization, should we feel at liberty to forbid it?

We submit the following test of the French operations in Mexico. They were undertaken in the day of our division and weakness. But we do not believe that the most thirsty thousand French soldiers in a hostile country, separated by three or four thousand miles from France, threaten the "safety or peace," the "rights or the interests," of the United States. What they do it will be proper to warn them to leave. But until they do it is enough to say to France, as the Government has already said and repeated, that the United States watch with interest and sympathy the fortunes of their neighbors. France had the right to declare what that means.

There is no occasion for the American people or for American generals to threaten or defy. We have long indulged the bad habit of loud boasting. The answer of the wise man was pointed at us in scorn for our fatal inconsistency of principle and practice. But now that from the Rio Grande to the Penobscot, peace and with irresistible power, our truest honor and dignity demand that we put away childish things.

CROTON WATER.

THE capacity of the aqueduct for bringing water to the city was intended to be, and we suppose is, equal to sixty million gallons per diem. While the population of one million inhabitants, gives sixty gallons a day to each person. This supply is much greater than that furnished to the inhabitants of London or Paris, or indeed to any of the principal cities of the world, and for domestic purposes is not only ample but liberal.

There are times, however, in dry seasons, when the flow of the Croton River into the dam which supplies the aqueduct is not equal to the carrying power of the aqueduct, at which times —generally in July and August—the water stored in reservoirs and dams is called upon with a view to furnish the maximum supply to the city of sixty million gallons per day, but the Commissioners of the Water Department well know that all the means for storing water yet provided (from the reservoir in the Central Park included) have proved wholly insufficient for this purpose, and that the safety of the city, in this respect, is due not only to its health but also to fires, makes it necessary to provide additional means for storing water. To accomplish this purpose an Act was applied for by the Water Department, and passed by the late Legislature, authorizing the Commissioners to purchase voluntarily, or take by assessment, such lands in the Valley of the Croton River, Croton Valley as they might think needful, for building dams to "store and impound" the waters of the river, so as to furnish, even in seasons of the greatest drought, the grand maximum of sixty million gallons per day. But although the surveys for over fifteen of such dams were made as early as 1862, and the Act of the Legislature was accompanied by an appropriation of three hundred thousand dollars for an expenditure to that extent, the season is nearly past without the commencement of any dam, or even the definite selection of any spot for this necessary work. The Board has consequently been condemned for this object. The well-known difficulties in the Department, resulting from the illegal appointment of two Commissioners of three to constitute the Board, or the illegal holding over of the two sought to be displaced, account in part for this delay; but we have also seen the recent decision of the Supreme Court in favor of the Commissioners sought to be displaced, the Board is acting as Commissioners, and we can conceive of no duty of greater importance to the city, or which should sooner engage their prompt and careful attention, than that of constructing immediately one or more of these impounding dams.

The capacity of the Valley of the Croton for supplying water is but little known to the community, but it is ample for whatever number of inhabitants may be congregated hereafter upon the island which defines the city's limits. The area of supply contains $338\frac{4}{10}$ square miles, embracing parts of Westchester, Putnam, and Duchess Counties, and a small portion of the high ground of Connecticut. With in this area the Croton has three branches—the east, middle, and west, which unite together near Croton Falls, about eight miles above the dam, after which union the Croton receives numerous tributaries. The mountain region on the Hudson River which commences at Peekskill and extends with a width of about fifteen miles to a point nearly opposite Newburgh, proceeds with that width east of the river across Westchester and Putnam Counties, forming the Highlands, or the mountain range which the city depends for water. The height of this region varies from one hundred and fifty to about fifteen hundred feet above tide-water, consisting mainly of the primary formation, and of a formation quite near to it in character, named by Professor EMMONS the Taconic, both of which contain no soft rock or soil but such as is suitable for water of high purity. In this mountain region numerous lakes are dotted about, which constitute natural reservoirs of considerable extent, but the main supply is of course from the copious rains which are poured upon these elevated lands in greater quantity than upon any other portion of the State.

The city has but to exercise due diligence to keep the aqueduct supplied to its full extent from these inexhaustible sources, and we hope to learn that the Board will be enabled to go forward with this work without delay. The time will undoubtedly arrive when not an additional or a larger aqueduct will be required for the wants of the city, to be supplied from artificial lakes, constructed in the high mountain valleys of Westchester and Putnam Counties. Provident circumspection and foresight will be exhibited by procuring the lands needed for this purpose before they become too high in price to justify their purchase. The population of New York and vicinity are destined to a growth of which history affords no parallel. Its future is announced to us by the ample provision which nature has made for eclipsing all other cities of the land. It has water sufficiently deep for all purposes of commerce out to the sea. While other Atlantic rivers degenerate into falls at the first step of the land upward from the ocean, the Hudson sweeps through this barrier at the Highlands without impediment, furnishing one hundred and sixty miles of tidal navigation. While other Atlantic cities have high mountains, varying from one thousand to four thousand feet, between them and the vast agricultural riches of the great West, the Alleghany dips at Little Falls to three hundred and thirteen feet above tide water (lower than Lake Erie), enabling us to reach mighty regions of earth with no difficulty resulting from intervening elevations. The avenues to Canada are equally to our advantage, and the disadvantage of other cities. The power of the city to grow is also indicated by its surroundings. The primary system, with its high and level table land, extends to the very coast at New York; while southward, all the way to Texas, the coast is flat—the flat lands varying in width from thirty to one hundred and fifty miles of coast, or, if not, of easily impoverished soil, not favorable to health. Near to us is abundant material for building of the most durable, and, at least, the means of an ample supply of water from Croton Valley. The necessity for obtaining the latter in the event needed for the full capacity of the aqueduct, is so apparent to guard against loss from fire and serious danger to health that the Commissioners will be held to a performance of duty in this matter equal to that of the exigency demands. The selection of ground for the first dam should be made with a view to obtaining the largest capacity as well as ultimately and frequently, leaving inferior dams to be constructed as from time to time the wants of the city call for additional water.

BUTTON, DAVENPORT, AND HOYT.

A RESPECTABLE man named DAVENPORT married a respectable woman, and they lived honorably and decently together in the town of Greenwich, Connecticut, working hard and eating the honest fruit of their toil. Some of their neighbors did not like that MR. DAVENPORT should be the husband of his wife, and they zealously assailed his house. Rocks were thrown by his mother they refused to retire, and she fired from the window, killing the ringleader. The coroner's jury pronounced it justice.

But a certain PHILANDER BUTTON read DAVENPORT a lecture upon the occasion, telling him that, although there was no law to prevent his marrying the wife, yet his conduct so to doing was most improper, and that he was in imminent danger in Greenwich, and had better go away. That he was about to remove with his family in his own house had done any thing improper MR. PHILANDER BUTTON did not say. That they, and all other ruthless breakers of the peace, had better leave the town of Greenwich, he did not advise. But that an industrious man who had offended no law, and who was living peaceably with all men, should depart if his ignorant neighbors took a prejudice against him, MR. PHILANDER BUTTON was very clear.

Mr. or Dr. J. H. HOYT said he had nothing to say but ditto to MR. BUTTON, and hoped the prisoner would avoid quarreling. To which MR.

DAVENPORT very conclusively replied: "Why, Sir, I never had any quarrel with any of them till they attacked me."

Now if the ignorant people of the town of Greenwich should be displeased with the domestic circumstances of Mr. PHILANDER BUTTON or Dr. or Mr. J. H. HOYT, and attack the houses of those gentlemen, what would be their opinion of a fellow-citizen of theirs who should say: "Here, you, BUTTON, you have violated no law, and your life is decent and orderly; but some people don't like you, and my duty to me as a friend is to leave; and you, HOYT, let me solemnly advise you not to quarrel with your neighbors."

Let them ask themselves what they would think of such a fellow-citizen, and reflect that it is precisely what every honorable man in the country thinks of their treatment of JEFFERSON. If the town of Greenwich in Connecticut can not protect its peaceable citizens against ruffians, let it say so. But if its reputable citizens virtually take the part of the ruffians against decent men, they cover themselves with the shame of complicity in dastardly offenses.

GOVERNOR HAMILTON OF TEXAS.

In the letter in which he advises the rebel leaders to surrender to the country "which alone has so little of hope," Mr. WADE HAMPTON speaks of the United States Provisional Governor of South Carolina, Mr. PERRY, as "an honest man and a true patriot." As he had just mentioned the Union men of the State as those "who forsook her in the hour of need, and who now gladly pull her down to irretrievable ruin," he evidently does not consider Mr. PERRY to be one of them. We are sorry that Governor PERRY should have received such praise from such a man.

But there is one Provisional Governor whom WADE HAMPTON will not praise. That is ANDREW J. HAMILTON of TEXAS. His proclamation to the people of that State is just what is should be. It spoke soberly, emphatically, and faithfully, what we believe to be the intention of the people of this country. It does not affect in any way to palliate the rebellion, nor to identify the writer with it. It neither calls it "our" armies, meaning rebels; nor of "our" cause, meaning treason. It informs the Texans that slavery is dead because it challenged a fight to mortal combat, and he begs to assure his fellow-citizens that the Government will protect the freedmen. It recommends the former slaves to engage with their former masters until the end of harvest; but he warns the employers that all combinations to coerce the laborers or to extract from those who have the right to vote any favor. He adds: "And candor compels me to say to the people of Texas, that, if in the action of the general convention the rights are characterized or treated as less than a freeman, our Senators and Representatives will seek in vain admission to the halls of Congress."

If the other Provisional Governors had spoken as truly and plainly the task of reorganization would have been much easier. Governor HAMILTON was one of the Union men of Texas who proved his faith by his works and was driven from the State. He knows the awful fate of his friends who could not escape. He knows what the spirit of the rebellion was. He knows that it is not extinct. He has learned by constant contact with loyal Americans during his visit what they think and mean; and he does not look for permanent pacification either to men like WADE HAMPTON or to those who think HAMPTON praises, but to those who believe that the country has been saved and not ruined by the war.

ON THE ROBBING OF BANKS.

IT is but the other day that the city was startled by the news that WINDSOR, a teller in the MECHANICS' BANK, had run away with gold and currency belonging to the bank to the amount of $200,000; and now it transpires that HENRY B. JENKINS, a teller in the Phenix Bank, has made away with the money of his institution—as to what amount no one knows, though the cashier—easy soul—protests that not over $300,000 has been stolen. Some fortunate bills, it appears, JENKINS did not run away, has been arrested, and has made a partial confession; one of his friends, known as his alleged accomplice, has likewise arrested, but settled his account with justice by cutting his throat with a penknife—which he had succeeded in his mouth—during his first night's imprisonment in a cell. JENKINS'S case lacks none of the elements of a cause célèbre. There is a fair but frail woman in it—once, it seems, a very pretty waiter girl, who wears impalpable hats, and gems of purest rays serene on her fingers—whether paid for, unconsciously, by unsuspecting stockholders in the Phenix Bank remains to be seen. And there is a "Butcher," cold and base, who, possessor of the poor defaulter's secret, used it to rob him remorselessly, and fed a bank account of his own with blood-money extorted from his victim. There is not even wanting a fair and virtuous lady who supplies the culprit with fragrant bouquets to perfume the fetid air of the Police Justice's Court. If JENKINS were but young and handsome, he would have the material of a thrilling romance made ready to our hand.

Unfortunately, he is an old man, half bald, seedy, threadbare, and altogether unromantic of aspect. He will not even be able to plead that the intoxicating delight of early love betrayed him to his fall; for he has a wife and children.

The late Mr. BUCKLE assured us that occult laws govern even the most seemingly accidental events of life, such as suicides and robberies; that the same number of persons commit suicide every year, and about the same number are robbed. Another deponent, Mr. HENRY THOMAS, of Brooklyn, had, by prodigious labor, constructed a table which proved that for ever so many years exactly seventy-one persons had been killed annually in the United States by lightning. But we are inclined to question the soundness of this theory of averages so far as bank robberies are concerned.

The natural tendency of every person who has character and training enough to become teller of a bank is not to steal. To overcome this tendency unusual temptation must be held out. A naturally honest young man will find this unusual temptation in a desperate love affair with a frail woman, or in the seductions of the gambling-table. A man who is not young will find it in eras of excessive speculation in stocks. In ordinary times, when the bank against defalcations, a cashier or president will only need to watch the private lives of his tellers, and to keep himself free from evil gamblers and not involved in disreputable intrigues. But in extraordinary periods of general speculation, when every man's ideas of certain rate life will warrant the conviction that they are not dabbling in stocks. JENKINS and WINDSOR had both been bank clerks for many years. If ever a person had proved by a long term of age and experience gave any title to trust he had it. Yet when the terrible speculative situation of 1861-'64 was at its height, and right away his principles, his long-tried fidelity, his regard for his family, even his self-interest, fell, it is reasonable to suppose that he, like other thousand bank tellers and cashiers throughout the country resisted the temptation, and that the number of bank defalcations which will be brought to light in 1865 and 1866 will be no larger than in 1862 and 1863?

Consider the position of a paying teller. He has so much money under his charge—from $100,000 to $1,000,000, as the business of the bank requires. This money at night is locked in the vault, of which the cashier has the theory, the book-keeper of the bank checks his balance every night, or, in this city, every morning, when the exchanges are made at the "clearing-house;" and the cashier examines the balance, as shown by the books of both, and counts the notes. In practice, book-keeper and teller combine to balance and count the money together. In order to ascertain the amount of "overs" and "unders," in other words, the sums which the bank has overpaid and underpaid. Even the most accurate tellers make mistakes daily, but generally they are found to balance each other. If the teller enjoys the confidence of the cashier and directors, his notes may pass current for days at a time intervals. If he says that the trunk or tray contains $400,000, they accept the statement as a fact, though it may contain only $300,000. Even tellers of different banks accept from each other $1,000 packages without counting them. This is the theory; practice, is the practice, not the theory, of modern banking.

Under this practice it is clear that a smart bank teller can always manage to abstract a certain percentage of the money placed in his charge, and keep it outside of the bank for long periods of time. If his average amount of notes on hand is $500,000, he can make his balance will never run below $200,000, and he can use half that sum without much risk of detection, if he is trusted by his superiors. Under these circumstances he sees men around him making fortunes by speculation. A friend of this man JENKINS once made $400,000 in a week. He sees his dividends, as the stockholder of his bank, gambling furiously in stocks and gold, and notes their profits. He is told by brokers what enormous sums he keeps for he is a cent cash, and that if he had but $10,000 he could double it in less than a fortnight. He resists the temptation for a long time, but, as we said, the natural tendency of every man in his position is to be honest. But he has so often seen the pretty-faced girl of his friend realized, so often seen Erie rise when he was told to sell out, so often met Old Southern fall when he was warned it would fall, that at last he yields. It is but a temporary loan from the bank, he says to himself—or more truly the bank's money—staked, he plays, the inexorable law of fate comes into operation and he loses. Then the bank's own money carries its curse. He has taken the plunge, however, and the sequel comes easier. The question for him is, how can he avoid the surrender himself a thief, or by further thefts endeavor to make good his losses, restore what he has stolen, and regain his self-respect. In short a dilemma no shrewd man could hesitate for an instant. He steals more, plays again, and again loses. Are there any instances of money made on stolen capital? But why pursue a tale that has been worn threadbare by the publishers of the "Washerwoman of Finchley Common?"

There is a point in bank defalcations by tellers at which the aid of accomplices becomes requisite, and this is perhaps the point to which public attention may be most carefully directed. To buy or sell stocks, the intervention of a broker is essential. How about a broker who receives ten or twenty or fifty thousand dollars from a bank teller as margin on speculative operations? Should he not be presumptively held to have been cognizant of the felonious source of his margins? If he did not know, ought he not to have suspected? Again, while a paying teller is absorbed in balancing and keeping upon the confidence of his employers, divert ten or twenty per cent. of his stock of notes, it is quite clear that he could make away with half his stock without accomplices in the bank. We do not pretend to know the details of JENKINS'S case. But it seems quite improbable that he could have abstracted even so large a sum as $300,000 from the bank without the connivance of other clerks. Days must have occurred when his stock of money was too small to discharge the debt of the bank at the Clearing-house—if his own accounts were the only ones that were falsified. On this head the suicide of EARLE, who had been book-keeper in the bank, is suggestive. But the investigation by the bank authorities and the courts should still be thorough.

An engineer and fireman declare that, on the whole, he doubts whether certain forms of vice are restrained in any perceptible degree by severe penalty. But, as defalcations concern us concerned, the axiom may perhaps be accepted. No teller robs a bank deliberately. He acts from sudden impulse, and generally regrets its commission. Nothing would repair the damage at once if he could. It is wholesome, probably, to peruse the homilies which JENKINS'S friends are preparing to the daily papers: it is well to read in clear print that rogguery is wrong, and honesty on the whole the best policy; but the bank officers, bank-holders and bank directors will do well, whenever stock speculation is lively, to inspect their accounts closely, and not to trust to any teller's report of his cash without counting the notes.

THE KETCHUM FRAUDS.

In an article, printed a few weeks since in these columns, some notice was made of a Wall street operation, which was sold and very profitably in Erie, and "a young banker of preternatural sagacity." The old and wary operator won—was a million dollars. The young banker of preternatural sagacity is now a fugitive from justice, having robbed the street so thoroughly that the SCHUYLER frauds appear trifling by the side of his. Can we tell him. EDWARD KETCHUM.

A mere narrative of the facts is more instructive than comment.

The great firm of KETCHUM, SON, & CO. has been for years the clearing-house for the Connecticut banks, and a number of other banks throughout the country. Its deposits have been usually over five million dollars. In the crisis of 1857 KETCHUM, SON, & CO. never suspended specie payments, and paid gold to those to whom they had to do so. When the suspension of 1861-'62 took place KETCHUM, SON, & CO. paid specie long after the banks were on a legal-tender basis. And for a long time after the currency began to depreciate they were the heaviest holders of gold in New York. When gold, after rising to 173, began to fall, they were still large holders. It was currently supposed they had made as much on the fall as they had previously made on the rise. When stocks began to advance in gold, they were large holders, and took the lion's share of the great harvest that was garnered in that year, and in the next quarter of a century fortune never denied them till April, 1864, when it was reported that they lost heavily during the panic.

By to that time the house had the credit of all the operations for which were made in its name, whether this theory was well founded or no, it seems that after April 1864, the house did not operate. But the two members, EDWARD and KETCHUM, did. He undertook, by a bold Bear campaign, to repair his April losses, and in the autumn and winter of 1864 he succeeded to a marvelous extent. Every one who has operated in Wall Street knows how quickly profits, or losses, accumulate in active times, when prices are large. Between June 1864 and January 1865, EDWARD KETCHUM must have made near a million dollars. He became infatuated with his success. He knew of the decisive victories won by GRANT, SHERIDAN, and SHERMAN, he sold stocks short, to an amount far exceeding the operations of JACOB CUYLER and FISK. His theory was that with peace would come collapse, prostration of business, decline of railroad receipts, contraction of currency, and general stagnation. It is an axiom in Wall Street that what every one expects never comes true. Every one agreed with EDWARD KETCHUM, and were enough every one was disappointed. There was no collapse, no prostration, no decline in railway traffic, no contraction of currency. The Bear movement failed, a Bull movement was inaugurated and was successful, and EDWARD KETCHUM lost all his previous gains, and probably all the money he could draw from his friends besides.

He was not discouraged. He paid his debts, preserved his credit, preserved his credit, revered his policy, and bought as many stocks for the rise as he had previously sold for the fall. Bought more—how many more no one knows; probably, in all, five times as many as JACOB LITTLE in his boldest days had ever dared to handle. Throughout he managed matters with admirable dexterity: always claiming to have little or no personal interest in the market, but to be merely the broker of a powerful and wealthy clique whose names remained concealed. He was believed. His purchases were commonly talked of as purchases by "the KETCHUM party." He was the party; he alone, by way of twenty-six—cold, serene, self-possessed; never, in any state of the market, hurried or excited; always a model financier.

Then the $1,000,000 were worth of stocks—and rumor estimates EDWARD KETCHUM'S purchases as high as this—money as well as credit was exhausted. People are apt to call up deposits on speculative contracts or even loans by the houses. Now EDWARD KETCHUM had lost his money. To what extent the house of KETCHUM, SON, & CO. were implicated with him, and to what amount he could use their capital, are questions which can not as yet be determined: it is clear, however, that in June and July of this year EDWARD KETCHUM needed money badly, and his brokers, GRAHAM & CO., must have pressed him for margins. He was not at a loss.

A few months since, with a view of facilitating transactions in gold, the gold brokers agreed to keep gold accounts in the Bank of the State of New York, and to transfer gold from one to the other by means of certified checks instead of carting the gold from office to office in bulk. The plan was apparent all the while gold in market in the city lay in the vaults of the State Bank; and deliveries among brokers were made by checks certified by the certified. The plan, lured to its customers check-books to be used exclusively for gold transactions. One of these checkbooks, issued in the name of CHARLES GRAHAM & CO., was stolen by EDWARD KETCHUM.

A few days afterward it became rumored that the gold market was to be "cornered." Large sums of money had been withdrawn by and left, of banks, bankers, and merchants, on gold, i.e. gold checks, at a high rate of interest, as the special contracts for that check should specify to be used in the market. Financial pundits in the daily papers declared that KETCHUM was trying to put gold up by creating a scarcity, and gave in practice how unwillingness to sell gold, i.e. gold checks, loaned out on the street. They little dreamed of the real reason of his policy.

On the 15th of August a bank-note engraving to be in a friend's office while the friend was examining his "collaterals," noticed a certificate of deposit among them. He knew the features of the check. He knew their signature. Seizing the piece of paper, he examined it. "Counterfeit gold," said he, "that MESSRS. SON and So don't know how to spell their own name." The "friend" was at once alarmed. The JENKINS defalcation had created uneasiness. He had called attention to the fact that a forgery had been, and asked if it was good. He was promptly told that it was a forgery. Within an hour messages to the number of $200,000, bearing the names of leading houses, were produced from safes and trunks, and were all pronounced to be checks forged. In every instance the checks had been used by GRAHAM & CO., or KETCHUM & CO., as collateral for loans.

Who was the forger? was now the question. This question was very simply answered. The State Bank, in assuming the monopoly of the issue of gold check-books, had a motive. It issued books of checks from 1 to 10,000, no matter to whom they were issued. Thus Jones got Numbers 54,000 to 54,100, SMITH 100,000 to 100,100, ROBINSON 9,000 to 9,100, and so forth. By noting the number of the forged checks, therefore, it was a matter of an instant to find out to whom the blank checks had been issued. By a clock P.M. on the 14th August, the bank knew that all the forged checks came out of the book sent to EDWARD KETCHUM & CO. The book had been sent to August six CHARLES GRAHAM, who had been in ill health and absent from his office for two months, was said to assure the bank that the check-book had never been seen in his office and had never departed from the possession of EDWARD KETCHUM.

Events thickened quickly. On the afternoon of 14th EDWARD KETCHUM, who had discounted the market with several brokers with his usual composure, sent a clerk, at four P.M., to the City Bank for $100,000 in bills for $70,000. It was past bank hours, but there was nothing unusual in the fact that KETCHUM, SON, & CO., who had so many transactions engaged in the purchase of grain and cotton, required that amount of currency at that late hour. The money was counted out, a receipt for it taken, and KETCHUM, SON, & CO. being in bills of small denominations. The money procured, EDWARD KETCHUM wrote a letter to his partners, acknowledging his crime and advising them what to do, walked up Broadway, with a bundle of bank-notes under his arm, bought a traveling-bag to hold his currency, and departed.

On the following morning CHARLES GRAHAM & Co., leading brokers, and KETCHUM, SON, & CO., unquestionably the first private banking-house in the city, stopped payment, and a frightful panic in Wall Street ensued. Over two millions of forged checks came to light during the day.

USELESS GRIEF.

Don't grieve for dead roses—a useless employment
That never was known to do any one good;
The future is sure to have food for enjoyment,
But grieving would spoil it if any thing would.

Look back, if you like, and muse over the beauty
Of hours that are gone; but pray do not forget
That they can not return, and it's every one's duty
To look on the bright hope without a regret.

Perhaps there's a voice, somewhere in the vista
Of life's retrospect, of sweet love and delight;
Now what is the use, because once you have kissed a
Dear girl that you loved, to think life is all night

Unless you can once more rejoice in the meeting
With those lips, to call them forever your own?
No doubt, could you find them, the very first greeting
Would show you that somehow their sweetness had flown.

There's the "Pleasures of Childhood"—or sweet to remember.
So careless, so bright, and all that sort of thing;
But what good can put on his cap for a December
With a flood of salt tears o'er the beauties of Spring?

When Spring is upon you rejoice in its sunrise:
When Summer is due do the same thing in shade:
But never forget it's nothing but moonshine
To think that the Winter for mourning was made.

Whatever the time, make the most of your pleasure:
Look forward, not backward, true courage to win:
There's a land we're invited to store with our treasure,
And that's where the dead, whatever you say,

Past joy and past sorrow have perished together,
And neither need shadow one hour of to-day.
If there's nothing in the future there's also no weather;
Bear one, greet the other, throw nothing away.

Don't grieve o'er the past, with its lovely dead hours;
It never was given to do any one good.
The future has music, and beauty, and flowers,
And grieving will spoil them if any thing would.

THE EMPTY SLEEVE AT NEWPORT;

OR, WHY EDNA ACKLAND LEARNED TO DRIVE.

THE first time Captain Harry Ash saw Love, purport, when, for the sake of the new life and strength the sea-breeze would give him, he had been ordered there with his left sleeve pinned across his left breast, and his whole frame feeble as that of any child, was Edna Ackland driving. She sat in one of those perfect basket-work affairs in vogue at Untertendom, behind a handsome pair of ponies, handling the reins skillfully, with her sister nestled at her side, and Mrs. Ackland, in the silver hat-band, bolt upright behind her.

The new feminine accomplishment has taken mightily at Newport, as well as on the gorgeous New York avenues of palatial residences and the drives of Central Park. And she was but one of fifty girlish drivers. But a battery of eyes rained upon her and glasses and whispers of admiration were profuse. Harry Ash heard some of them.

Fitzfoodle's simper.

"Veway fine gal, and knows how to dwive."

And the "By George, what a beauty!" of young Tiptop.

It was a pretty picture. Never did face look so bonnily beneath the shade of hat and plume. Never did white fingers handle the reins so deftly.

The only face that frowned was that poor, warworn face of Captain Harry Ash. He looked glum her, flushing and paling by turns. The sight was an unlovely one to him. Heaven knows.

He had, young as he was, old-fashioned principles. He liked womanly women. The girls of society, in their pronounced toilets, with their loud laughter and bold eyes, and ambition to be "fast," often shocked him. And this new freak of driving had seemed to him out of all. She knew it was right so. She whom he had so often driven over that Newport beach (ah, he should never so drive any one again), she whom he had loved because she seemed so womanly and gentle—a darling thing to be watched over and guarded from harm—driving with the daring eyes of fops and roués turned upon her, eager for their praise and admiration, forgetful of him and his wounds.

Ay, that was it, after all—not the mere fact of her driving on Newport beach, but that she should be there on the day of his return, merry and forgetful.

He had hoped to find her watching for him—to meet her sooner than by quite alone. It not more vanity than fails fairly to the lot of handsome men, but he had thought she loved him. In his saddest hour that belief had given him a little gleam of comfort, and he had dreamed of a fireside with Edna by it always. It was over now. And she loved him she would not have been here. And the poor fellow groaned involuntarily, and hid his face, worn from pain, under transparent hand.

While he languished on the hospital cot, fanned by the black wing of the Death Angel hovering over him, and Love's lucid lineaments blacking-of her, she had been learning to drive for the sake of Fitzfoodle's praise and young Tiptop's complimentary.

The dancing-hall and the billiard-room—filled as they were with handsome fops and fortune-hunters—had been her world, and he was quite forgotten.

Well, she owed him no duty. They were not betrothed. He was less—a helpless, crippled fellow, shut off from manly sports for life at twenty-six!—an invalid to be nursed and tended, who needed what only could give so little. She should fancy a mere flirtation bound that bright young beauty, with every advantage wealth and position could give a handsome girl, to her.

Yet even while he spoke he felt that he had thought her all his own; and called to mind a parting hour in which, though not a word was spoken, a kiss had been stolen and not resented.

A moment's pressure of two little hands by a two-year-old eyes met his own. A moment never to be forgotten by the young soldier while life should last. Other girls had been constant to their warworn lovers—other maimed men returned to find tender bosom ready to pillow their weary heads—fond hearts more fond for any ill that might have fallen on them.

So had he hoped and dreamed to find Edna; and he met her driving on the crowded beach, so eager to mark the applause of the loungers that she had driven past him without knowing it. Past him, who would have known the very sound of her voice in any throng. For a few moments the soldier battled with hot tears and swallowed choking sobs. Then he was calm.

"So be it," he said. "I have borne much; I can bear more. I have given my left arm to my country. My heart's best love must follow it, let me accept my fate as a man and a soldier should."

And a stern look came over his face, and he leaned back among his pillows, and lay like one dead outward.

But a little while he had himself driven back to the hotel, and there fatigue was a sufficient excuse for keeping his own room and avoiding Edna Ackland, and all the rest of fashion.

At best he hated the endless questioning and commiseration—the answering of inquiries as to his health, and how and where and when that sleeve became empty. He did not enjoy the role of hero, nor the admiring pity of simpering misses and stout mammas. Edna Ackland's sympathy was the only sympathy he craved, and that he had not. So, shut in his own room, while the world of Newport was abroad, taking the air or dining with each other over at dinner, Captain Ash lived quite as much alone as he might in a desert island, and was quite content at raid of masculine friends, who came to "cheer him up," and failed signally in that praiseworthy endeavor.

The sea air was doing the convalescent very little good. In fact he was weaker than when he came to Newport.

A happy heart is the best medicine, and hope better for the invalid than the balmiest breezes ever blown. "Hope, Harry!" Ah, he did. But not even wish to live.

Sometimes on the nights of the renowned Newport "hops," when music came stealing on the balmy air to his very window, and the sound of dancing feet, and the rustle of silken robes, and memory of hours when he was the merriest of the throng, the poor young soldier would sit with his aching head and heart alone, and fancy believing that he could see Edna among the dancers—Edna, in the white dress he loved to see her wear, with pearls about her throat and in her hair.

Ay, and with young Fitzfoodle for a partner, and a throng of brainless boys about her when she drew away for a little breathing space, while Fitzfoodle pirated a fan of shell with whip and rein.

Perhaps she looked and spoke as other girls did now, not with the distant glance and tone of Edna of old, and yet he longed unseen to see and hear her.

One night the longing grew so strong that to get out of it he left his room, and crawled forth out into the open air, and down a romantic path where he hoped he should not hear the music and the tinkle of dancing feet. But it came. He could see it there. The lights flashed through the dark foliage of the noble oaks that overhung the cliffs on the edge of the sea. That music was like his memory, he could not escape it. For he had walked too far already, and was too sick down and rest—he who had been once so strong. He flung himself on a garden-seat and wiped the damp drops from his brow.

"I am getting no stronger," he thought. "I shall never live to see the flowers die. Will she weep, I wonder?"

Even as he spoke a soft sobbing broke upon his ear—the note a dove mourning for her mate might make. It seemed so close to him, though he looked. The garden seat rested with its back against a great tree, and on the left was a hedge, and other walk, was a like seat. On this a lady sat—her head bent down—the moonlight lying on great folds of tender blue silk, and falling in broken gleams and sobs, suppressed but audible to the young soldier, heaving her bosom. That wealth of hair, that peculiar form, could be Edna's alone. He rose from ward to be certain, and a branch rustled, and the lady started up in affright. It was Edna Ackland. And she was not for the world to know that he had upon his face. For a moment both remained motionless. Then she arose and came around the tree and sat down beside him.

Her eyes were swollen with weeping, and she held out her hand out to him. What could he do but take it?

"You are better?" she said. "I feared you were very ill. You have been here a week and never been near us. Was that right?"

"You forget I am an invalid and not equal to society yet," he said, coldly.

"Forgot—oh no!" and her glance took in his empty sleeve—"I could not forget."

"How could you, indeed! I am sadly altered—neither useful nor ornamental to the world. The next thing I can do is to sit it, as I expect to soon."

She stretched her hand to—and with a sudden impulse her face followed—and kissed like a caress, and drew it back blushing scarlet.

"Nay, you are better. The doctor told mamma so. All you need is exercise. You shall drive out, or go upon the water more."

"I am not strong enough yet. He answered curtly: "Driving is very pleasant to one who possesses Miss Ackland's new accomplishment. It is also an charming lesson who can never handle whip or rein again. The same with boating. Perhaps you are also mistress of the oar?"

"Yes, I am very well, I believe."

So she boasted of it. His lip curled.

"Were Miss Ackland a gentleman I should compliment her. As it is—"

"Well, Captain Ash?"

"I can but regret it."

"Why?"

"I grieve to see a woman unwomanly."

Edna Ackland sat gazing upward for her ideal about her. She intended to sail away in dignified silence, but her eyes grew blind with tears. Despite all she could do they escaped from beneath her lashes, and she had no resource but to wipe them away with her kerchief. Of late she had been in the habit of crying, and was not mistress of her eyes.

Harry Ash had had his fling. Now he regretted it. He arose and stepped forward.

"I was ungentlemanly—brutal," he said; "forgive me. I am a very child—I am as weak and worn. Miss Ackland, surely / have not power to bring tears to your eyes. My opinion is not so much to you?"

But she sobbed on softly, and he stood looking at her abashed and grieved.

"It was an old prejudice," he pleaded, "quite out of date, I know. Forgive me, Oh Edna, Edna!" The name broke from him unawares. He took another step forward. The parting hour came back to him—the touch of those little lips. Had he been mistaken? Did she love him after all?

If so, what had he done? And he almost sobbed: "Edna, do not hate me for my brutal words! Edna, forgive me, pity me, love me; for in my maimed body dwells a heart all yours to its last beat!"

And then his one arm stole about her waist and drew her close to him.

"Are you really angry that I have learned to drive?" she said, after a few minutes. "No—don't answer; I must tell you first why I learned. I knew you loved me; I felt sure that you would tell me so when you returned; and, Harry, if you had lost both arms it would have made only one difference—I should have loved you more. So I when they told me you had lost an arm, the first thought that came to me—and was there any first thought after the shock was over, I mean—He will be so helpless! There will be so many things he can not do for himself. I must be his hand and right hand also, should it be God's pleasure. And that thought staid in my mind, and will stay there forever."

"So, old Mark taught me to drive; and I learned, as I have learned many things, for love of you. You are not angry with me, Harry?"

Angry! It was strange anger then. It flashed brightly in his eyes, and he raised in his eye, and told itself in a soft shower of kisses.

They are married now, and you may see them any day driving upon the Newport beach in the pleasant August afternoons. Her hands guide the reins, and he sits with empty sleeve tucked in. Yet, for all that, his eye is on the road and his voice guides her; so that, in reality, she is only his left hand, and he, the husband, drives.

THE CRACK IN THE CHURCH FLOOR.

OCRS was a quaint old church, built of rough stone, with a peaked roof, and an odd little steeple, where a set of sweet bells hung. It had the queerest little organ-loft, with carven balustrades, on about which cherubims seemed to flutter, and a birdnest of a pulpit hung in mid air. Once the Church Huguenots had held here Rochelle and worshiped there, but it was an Episcopal church now, and most of the members belonged to it. But that they always attended regularly; for once it was said, driven to madness by the beggarly array of empty pews, the Rev. Edna Dunbury had begun his sermon thus: "Dearly beloved Mr. and Mrs. Norroway and Mr. Parmelyea"—addressing the only churchwes present—"and the seats awake. But it was of a rainy day, and before the organ came—the new organ, bright and loud of voice, which the Church Huguenots had bought out by sermons, came to hear. When this became an attraction, and good Dr. Dunbury Germon organist, he formed a choir, there was, on pleasant mornings, quite a display of best bonnets within, and of waggons, gig, and saddle-horses without. The sexton bunchbacked Timothy Brown, parish clerk and cordwainer, tip-toe out during service time, and close himself into the leather boots and shoes, made or mended through the week; under the seats of his customers' wagons, that they might take their boots home dry, and returning, drop a cobweb until charitably awakened by the head of the house of Adair, occupying the front pew, who poked at him across pews and bundrells or waiting-chair, and caused him to start to consciousness with a solemn "Amen" that frightened soundly out of a doze but sometimes as ridiculously in the nick of time.

I sang in the church choir, and when it was needed I sang in the new seventeen.

One October day, the last of the month, which chanced to fall on a Thursday, we went, according to custom, to practice some new music in the church. Early as it was, it was Christmas music, for we intended to make a musical display of our accomplishments on that day, when the church was always full of strangers. And I suppose no one had the thought that on Christmas day old Dr. Hine would sit at the organ, and we fill each a place behind the red curtain of the choir. That afternoon was delightful for practice, and we walked over together. She had the soprano voice. I sang contralto. There were maple leaves thick about the church, and many fell in the quiet of them rustled under our feet. Some had blown into the church itself, and as Miss Sophy stepped in she stooped and began picking them up. "You are the first this time, Isaac," he said.

"The first—then Mr. Hess has not come yet?"

"Ah! he's come, Miss Sophy; warrant him for that. The first ladies I meant. But he's not playing."

We ran up the steps of the organ-gallery, Abby first. At the head of them she paused, and I, neither of us knew why—stood still also. The loft, just coming from such a bright October sunlight, was dim. Only a single window threw out what Mr. Hess was doing. He was on his knees, his head bent down.

"Is he praying?" whispered Abby.

We crept forward a step. I said, "Mr. Hess." There was no answer. I said it louder. No answer still. Then Abby and I, instead of going forward, ran back and screamed together, and brought old Timothy from the aisles below.

Our prayer organist knelt there dead!

We fancied he must have felt death stealing over him, and knelt down to pray. There was a sweet smile on his face, and one hand was in his broom clutching a locks, to which lay coiled a mass of flaxen hair. We buried it with him, for we all felt it must be some relic of the past life of which he knew nothing. After that the organ stood dumb, and we missed the dear old German face and the kindly voice. It was of foreign accent, which we knew so well, and without him we had a heart to sing. Not even at Christmas time.

In the spring, when violets were on his grave, we heard that a new organist had been engaged, and that the Thursday and Saturday afternoon inquisitive were to commence. I was together once more in the church. The old minister was there, and with him a gentleman who looked about thirty years old. He had a fine, tall figure, an olive complexion, and eyes never seen save when the complexion is pure olive; Spanish eyes, shaded by jet-black lashes. When he stepped forward to speak to us I saw that he was very slightly lame, I said old Mr. Danbury introduced us in a sort of impromptu sermon. Under the head of "firstly" he informed our organist that we were the most remarkable choir, to whose liberality all those dissensions peculiar to such institutions had been utterly unknown. Secondly, he let us know that Mr. Andrew Dalton did us a favor in the engaging us, and that he was a wondrous organist. Thirdly, he hoped our amity would continue, and increase if possible, and then sat down, with his face beaming with smiles, to listen to our first afternoon's performance.

At the first touch we knew Mr. Hudson was master of the instrument; but whether we should like him personally remained to be proved. I thought him very handsome; Abby Adair did not—and he was certainly grave and silent to a fault.

We were not cautioned to spoil Mr. Hess, and his fatherly interest in each and all of us, that even a genial stranger would have seemed very different—his gentleness more particular—to us, for a peculiar manner.

But I walked home that evening with our pastor, and on the way he told me quite a romantic story of our new organist. How, at twenty, he had saved a child from being crushed by the overturning of a wagon driven by a drunken man, and, in the act, been so injured that it was for a time thought he would never walk again except on crutches. How, at this, the girl he loved—a giddy butterfly, with neither heart nor soul—had jilted him, and married some one else; and how, even while suffering great agony at intervals, the young man began to study music as a profession, by which in his crippled state he could support his mother and himself.

"He had genius, and succeeded wonderfully," continued the clergyman. "And God has given him health and energy again, almost miraculously—and as for the girl, I believe, but for these few long days which have been given to him to know and grave him so much time to think, he would have quite forgotten her. And sometimes I believe, and the old brother said, that if he ever should another woman he can love he will become his old, lighthearted self again."

I nodded at me as he spoke. He was very old, and often uttered his thoughts aloud without intending to do so.

"Pretty, very pretty," he muttered. "Golden hair and blue eyes—colored just as she was—and a sweet voice. Yes. Then, with a start at me, "Eh, awakened look—There's the parsonage, Sophy; won't you come in and see Mrs. Danbury?"

And I was glad of the excuse—and went. Besides, I wanted to think. The new organist was a different person already in my eyes. I felt sorry for him that he was acquainted with the girl—sorrier that he was no longer very lame—as though I had known him all my life; and I hoped that he would soon come to love. Love—I knew that she was could not understand him. Ruth Maitland or Bess Hilarold?—any, such had a suitor.

And then, at home, I went to the glass and looked at Sophy Norroway!

Was Dr. Danbury right—was I? I had golden hair and blue eyes. Perhaps I was pretty; and I was sure that if I had been that girl I never, never—

There the folly of my thoughts overcame me: I laughed aloud. Silly, silly girl! I cared nothing for that dark, sad stranger; and he had not even looked at me.

Not then; but I could not say the same afterward. There came a time when, lift my eyes when I would, I met his fixed upon me. Eyes that I could not learn: a quiet, earnest look, as though he were trying to read me through. He used to listen when others, even though he very seldom conversed with me; and once, I fancied, changed my seat without some purpose, to have an excuse that I could see better. At last, as I sat sewing at home one day, near the window, I lifted my eyes and saw him going up the minister's garden path.

We talked that day. Shy people can only really converse on tête-à-tête. And when he went away I felt that I loved him.

The first time I ever saw him smile was when he held out his hand to me on the last week in May.

It was a very sweet smile, brimful of kindliness.

I was just eighteen, he nearly thirty. I fell in love with his smile—I, no sooner for the first time out. A few of those visits, half a dozen of those long quiet chats, and I loved him fondly. I believed he loved me. I could not have known. Not that he ever said any thing, but looks and tones are better signs than words sometimes. I was young and inexperienced. I trusted to them, perhaps, more than I should. I never told Sophy so. I never told anybody. I never told Mr. Hess. When Thursdays came I knew I should see him, and the sky seemed brighter than that of any other morning, and Sundays were days of nobly hope and joy to me; and whenever at home in the still evening, with grandpa asleep in his easy-chair, I heard coming up the garden path that well known step, with the little halt it had not quite lost yet, my heart began to beat and my cheek to flush.

Oh, I loved him so! I loved him so! Words can not tell how well I loved him.

So, in those lonely days at home, when I had little to do but think, I built castles in the air, womanly castles, with his face in every scene, and almost without knowing it I was waiting for him to ask me to be his wife.

I was quite my own mistress, old grandpa would never say me nay, and he loved Andrew almost as well as I did, and grandma always humored me.

The happiest memories of my life are of that choir in the old church. Some day I may be old and blind and deaf to outward things, but I shall always be able to see that organ. The olive face and Italian Spanish eyes here over the screen, and the golden sunlight falling over the sweet picture through the narrow window over head, and burnishing the glimmering organ and the waves of jet black hair. I shall always, until earthly music is drowned by that of heaven, hear Andrew Hudson playing as he played in those happy hours.

One Thursday I went earlier than usual to find only the clerk in the church sailing down on carpets on the aisles. As I paused to look at them he put his hand in his pocket. "A letter for you," he said, and stretched toward me a little white note and spotless, with one drop of green wax in its midst.

We girls had a sentimental habit of writing notes, and this was nothing new. I took it carelessly in my hand and slipped it in my pocket to read at home. I had seen a form I knew moving among the grave-stones in the church-yard, and could think of nothing else.

Just then the clerk, flinging away a bit of old carpet, called me.

"See, Miss Sophy, what a crack. They'll be sorry they don't heed me about this floor some day." There, just at the foot of the altar, where the large gallery winter singers sat was indeed a crack, wide and deep, leaving full four inches between the floor and the new step at that corner. "It is a pity the setting, Miss," said he. "The church is getting old, you see; I reckon it'll last my time, though," and he measured away fathomly, making a note in a packet that neither of us heard any one approaching until a voice cried:

"Ah! my carpets. The church will be smart next Sunday."

It was Andrew Hudson. He stood looking down upon us with his great eyes.

"Not before we needed 'em, Sir," said Timothy. "But what's the use o' carpets when the folks won't wearing 'em out? Beg pardon—want to pass, Sir?"

Andrew gave me a look. It said "Come." I felt my cheek flushing. I longed to be near him, for he loved me, and yet the fancy that he might be going to speak now frightened me.

"I have a note I ought to read," I said, taking it from my pocket.

"No matter; let the note alone; read it at home. Come sit in the gallery with me until the rest come."

He said it in such a pleading whisper, under cover of the old clerk's hammering, that I could not refuse. We went up together, I not daring to look at him.

There was a pile of new music on the stand, and in my confusion I sought refuge in that. As I bent over the paper he bent over me, the ball in a moment he had caught me about my waist and kissed me. Such a kiss, I feel it yet burning on my forehead.

I was not angry. I will not tell a falsehood, I was glad. I bent then Abby Allen's head, instead of ringing up the gallery stairs, and I wrenched myself away from him. In a moment she was with us, and half a dozen more followed, and I was thankful not alone again that day. How many mistakes I made in my music, with the memory of that kiss driving every other thought from my mind, I am afraid to tell.

That evening I watched and waited for Andrew at home. I felt sure he would come—sure that he would speak at last; but though I listened all the evening I did not hear his step upon the gravel. At last I went to bed, feeling sad and disappointed, and forgetting all about the little note until I was fairly undressed. Then I looked in the pocket of the dress I had taken off for it. It was not there.

It was such a singular thing that it should be gone that I suddenly became intensely alert. I dressed myself in a shawl and went all over the house with a candle, but in vain. Here I had lost the note I could not guess, but it was lost undoubtedly, and somehow the loss began to trouble me, unimportant as I believed the epistle must be.

Well, my trouble began that night. Andrew Hudson never came near the house, and when Saturday afternoon came I went to the church to practice, feeling sure I should hear he was ill; but there he sat at the organ, and never so much as looked at me when I came in. Why, I could not guession to speak to me it was in an altered voice, and there were great rings about his dark eyes which made them look hollow.

"What could it all mean, was he ill or angry with me?" I longed to ask him.

But he gave me no opportunity. As soon as the hour was over he hastened away, saying something about "an engagement."

I looked over the balustrade after him and saw him descending the stairs very slowly, with a spiritless, weary look upon his face that brought hot tears to my eyes.

Why did he look so? He had been happy and bright-eyed and eager when we last met. Why did he neither look at nor speak to me? He had kissed me then.

I asked these questions of myself a thousand times, but found no answer. He never gave me one. Week after week passed and he did not look near our house. Time after time I sang in the choir and he never even spoke to me; and the troubled look was ever on his face, and he had grown older in this short space of time.

At last I could bear it no more.

To love him so and be so utterly separated from him, even while I could have touched him with my hand. To feel to my heart's core the coldness of his look and tone when he was forced to speak to me. Oh, my heart was rung in those days!

It ached as young hearts only can ache, and the worst was, it was a grief I could share with no one. So, finding there was no explanation coming, I left the choir. I had a cold, and my voice was weak. There was a real reason to give, and I gave it. And Emily Allen took my place, and sat on the seat between grandpa and grandma in the old church below. I could hear him there, but I could not see him.

I think grandpa guessed something was wrong. But she thought me such a child that she could hardly think of any reason for my grief.

A week after I had left the choir the organ was dumb again. Andrew Hudson's engagement had expired and he refused to renew it.

He left New Rochelle without even bidding me good-by. I never knew how much hope was left in my heart until I heard that he was gone.

That day I staid in my own room. And ill enough I really was, Heaven knows.

There is no ail of the body like that of the heart. Though grandma's pills and potions I flung out of the window by stealth when the doors shut.

The next day I dressed myself and went down to breakfast. As I stood before the glass I said to myself: "Sophy Norroway, time has come when you must play the woman. The only man you have ever loved or ever can love has no love for you. He has not spoken to you, but we are to blame at first, for he gave you cause to think he was fond of you, you would be to blame now to withhold love in your heart for him, or, if you can't crush it, hide it. Look as well and be as merry as you can, and let nobody guess cause to point at you and say, Sophy Norroway was disappointed in love, and that is why she never married, when you are the truest friend to old and young a woman should ever love. For we can be sure of nothing in this earth, and life is worthless to her for love who she loves dies or forsakes her. A man can love twenty women. But a woman never truly loves more than one. Love is love, and often and often that I had never met Andrew Hudson.

Fighting down the love that was trying to wreck me, and trying to crush it, I laughed and hope, doing it in some measure, I lived through the long years. At the end of the tenth grandpa died, and grandma followed him in a few months.

"I couldn't live without him," she said. "You see we'd been together fifty years, husband and I, and Jane were the first baby that ever parted her speak; for an hour after she died, with her cheek lying softly on her hand and her eyes wide open.

I could not grieve for them—it seemed so selfish. But I was all alone in the world. I lived alone in the old house and let the rooms be empty, and sat alone in the pew with grandpa's name upon the back, where it had been for fifty years. I heard the new organist—a lady—play, and I heard her sing, and thought, despite myself, of the hands which had once touched the keys.

There were many changes in the church. Old Mr. Danbury had been gathered to his fathers. The girls who had sung with me were mostly married, and as I might have been had I loved as I would give no man a heart with another's name written on it, and I was left to live my own life—one who would have made my lonely life pleasanter. I was nearly thirty, and the young folks called me "old maid Sophy."

I knew, but I was well content, for none had ever found my secret out.

My thirtieth birthday fell on the first Sunday of October. It was eleven years since the first Sabbath Andrew Hudson had played upon that organ to which I listened absently as Miss Phillips sang (as she styled it) the people in—a strain he had been fond of; and as I listened the old memories swept over me thick and fast. I lost my footing upon the front of my pew, and prayed that God might bless him and love wherever he might be; for, after all these years, and my long battle with myself, there was no change in my love.

When I lifted my head a stranger was passing up the aisle. A man of forty, with an olive skin and Spanish eyes—with crisp black hair flecked with silver, and lines about the crow's-feet, finely formed, but walking with a slight limp—Andrew Hudson, ten years older than when I had last seen him, but Andrew Hudson yet.

I never hoped to look upon him again with living eyes. I fainted then, and I do not quite sure I could live through that hour. The suppressed agitation seemed to be killing me; yet the very sight of him was joy. He sat above me in the side-aisle, and could not see me without turning his head.

Even then, with my mourning veil down, he might not know me, and I could hardly be the same at thirty I was at eighteen.

I looked and looked, great tears welling into my eyes. I was not conscious of any thing going on about me. I only knew I saw Andrew.

Suddenly there was the sound of a crash—a rumbling shaking of the church and screams from female voice. The whole congregation started to their feet at once and pushed doorward, the old clerk trying his best to stop them.

"If there's any danger at all," he made them hear at last, "it's just by the door. The floor has given way. I've said it would these twenty years."

At that the crowd huddled back and found themselves at a stand-still.

I had then a hand touched my shoulder. A voice said:

"Do not be alarmed. The church will not tumble about our ears yet. The only danger is a rush over the weak spot of the floor."

It was Andrew's voice, and I did not dare to look at him.

I stood quite still. Some of the bolder souls had leaped the chasm; others had clambered through the windows. The ladies were being handed over by way of an improvised bridge, and the place was almost empty.

The new clergyman had come down from the pulpit, and, finding that I was with no one, was near me. The clerk and Deacon Blauvelt peered into the aperture.

"The beams have been dry-rotting a long while," said the latter. "One of 'em is in two, and the sidebeam—I've written a letter!"

He interrupted himself by kneeling down and thrusting his arm into the chasm. There, on the ledge formed by the lock rail, rested a letter—a dirty, cobweb-covered, but with the seal unbroken.

"Miss—Sophy—Norroway," he read, slowly.

"Why, Sophy, that's yours!"

I saw Andrew Hudson start violently and turn his eyes upon me with a new look in them, and I stretched out my hand. How it trembled!

"An old letter," I said. "I lost one before I read it ten years ago. It must have slipped through that crack in the floor we all know of." And I spoke calmly, though my heart was beating so that I could hear it.

I crossed the bridge with a laugh the next moment, chatted a while with the clergyman's wife, and then walked home. Half-way I heard a step following me—a step I knew so well. I tried to go on and could not. I paused. He gained upon me. He was beside me. I waited, with its rounded fingertips, caught mine.

"Miss Norroway—Sophy," he almost gasped.

"Stop—listen to me—I beseech you. Sit down here, under these maples, and read that note—read and answer it, and then take you, but with a word or a smile—a look. Life seems within my grasp once more!"

I sat down upon the grass under the maples, and drew me down beside him.

In a sort of dream I broke the seal and glanced over the first words of the page before me. It bore the date of eleven years before, and read thus:

"DEAR SOPHY:

I tried to read on, but the letters danced before my eyes. I glanced at the signature and saw his name. I looked at the first line, and read:

"Sophy," he pleaded, "read all, and answer me."

But there was no need. The truth had flashed upon me. The letter had been from him, and given me to be his wife, and he had taken silence for rejection of his suit. Oh the ten long years of hidden sorrow! Oh, if he had changed me from a girl to a woman, that had sprinkled silver in his ebon locks! What bitter payment for one careless act! He drew nearer to me.

My eyes met his, my hand was stretched toward him. "O, Andrew!" I cried.

"You never could have been so dear to me had you not loved me all the while."

And the next moment I was clasped to his breast, and our lips met in their first kiss.

Have I told you enough? I will not sadden the story now by going back into those weary years of separation—I will not weary you with the chain of events which brought him on that day to New York, storming the church porch. But I will tell you how, on one sunny morn, Queen Anne's bells in that old church steeple rang a wedding chime, and so end my story with the hour that made me Andrew's wife.

PERILOUS WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.—The Chinese say: "The Seven Wise Women of Persia" was a royal edict prepared a deal of care, governing domestic matters in that land, as it does in fact that "there are three kinds of people in the world—men; but which of the three is the most miserable? A proper man always does as he pleases whatever the wife says; but a man of no spirit, unwilling wretch, who grins for fear of a little; and your hopeless is a despicable, jealous creature, who gives his wife nothing but makes her do her own work, and is so suspicious that, if she stays away all day, he is sure to ask her where she has been."

SMOKING DISTURBED.—A young ox was observed the other day, in the neighborhood of the Cattle Market, playing at pitch and toss in the open meadows. Such if the progress of civilization!

"I'm not so strong as I used to be," as the lion remarked after it was bolted.

A BAD DRAWING.

Why is the British Government like a bad drawing?—Because it's *not a Reform*ing policy public.

A GRAVE-DIGGERS' STRIKE.—The Courrier de Saône et Loire says: "Sagalchal news reaches us from Autun. The grave-diggers have struck! The people of Autun must not, therefore, die, unless they wish their bodies to remain unburied. We can see no other way of opposing the pretensions of men who live by other people's deaths."

JOHN G. SAXE has put forth the following epigram:

Saratoga and Newport—you've seen 'em,
Said Charley, one morning, to Jon;
Pray tell me the difference between 'em,
For bother my wig if I know."
Both Jo, "'Tis the same matter
At once to distinguish the two;
At one, you go into the water,
At the other, it goes into you."

ARE NOTE.—We have been favored with a private view of a picture of despair. Without accumulating the details, we may observe that the banking sentiment is considerably overdone, and that the money displays a sad want of keeping.

LINES TO A YOUNG LADY OF FASHION.

I love thee for thy chignon, for the bees of purchased hair
Which thou hast so thine exploit the charming taste to bear;
Oh, what a grace that ornament unto thy poll doth lend,
Wound on what seems a curtain-rod with knobs at either end.

I love thee for the roses, purchased too, thy cheeks that deck,
The lilies likewise that adorn thy pearly-powdered neck,
And all that ever I discover'd, that, o'er thy features spread,
Improves the poor reality of Nature's white and red.

I love thee for the mouths and the gazes about thee bound,
Like endive that in salad doth a lobster's tail surround;
And I love thee for the crowds of suitors that attend,
So proper to the mouth style young ladies now affect.

Move thee for thy figure not; these may, for aught I see,
Be clothes-horse it adapted for the display of dress to be.
I do not love thee for thy face, do but thy surface know,
The picture tho' it value, not the canvas laid below.

I love thee for thine happiness, thy vanity, and pride;
But oh! too lovely, far too dear, art thou to be my bride.
So while as thou wouldst prove, to marry me, slow art,
How very rich I ought to be, and should be—what an ass!

TWOPOLD ILLUSTRATIONS.—Sir Fletcher Norton was noted for his want of courtesy. When pleading before Lord Mansfield, on some question of manorial rights, the counsel made use of the word "cock-shut-time." "Pray, sir," said the judge in a tone of mingled surprise and irritation in my opinion; I myself have no little manors." The judge immediately interposed, with one of his blandest smiles, "We all know it, Sir Fletcher."

FURNISHED RATES.—A servant-girl in that uncertain region known as "Out West" recently tried whisky to kill the rats, and made it seem quite convincing by her friend, and set the dish in the cellar. A few hours after she went down and found several rats intoxicated. "Fiddled," engaged in throwing potato parings and hashing one another with the dish. These were mostly disposed of; those who killed left the premises immediately, undoubtedly suffering with a severe headache.

The following is the verdict of a negro jury: "We, the undersigned, being a korner's jury to sit on de body of de nigger Sambo, found dead and gone, do say dat de said nigger as dead as said nigger aforesaid, and he did on de night ob de fourteenth of November, come to def by fallin' from de bridge ober de river in so said river, what we find he was a nigger Sambo aforesaid, and afterwards washed on de ribber side, what we s'pose he was frase to def."

APPOSE DE I'APPROBATE.—Why does Solon remind you of a doorway?—Because she is an ostrea.

AN EREOR.—"Of she goes!" said Mr. Smith to his spouse, as they entered the railway carriage for Hastings. "You are wrong, said Mrs. Smith, "for she is the 'mail' train."

A countryman once brought a piece of board to an artist, with the request that he would paint upon it St. Christopher as large as life. "But," returned the artist, "this board is much too small for that purpose." The countryman looked perplexed at this unexpected answer. "That's a bad job," said he; "but, look'ee, Sir, ye can do as he has long done—cover the edges."

The reason why those astute people the French call a chorus a refrain is that it is generally better left out.

JULY.

BY AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

THE heavy twilight closes round;
The church clocks their old tale repeat;
Dulled is the hoarse, unresting sound
Of traffic in the sultry street;
Languid the ebbing tide of feet;
Languid the leaves of the one tree
From my attic-window see.

A poor, unlovely, stunted thing,
With crippled stem and scanty leaves;
And yet it tells me tales of spring,
And legends of the summer eves.
Alas! the dusty wind bereaves
My life of its one grace, what day
It rends the last dead leaf away.

For weary hands and eyes are free
To steal a moment's rest at times,
And when I look, to ponder tree
I dream of sunny, southern climes,
And weave my fancies into rhymes
That rise and fall, like summer airs
As bend those branches to the breeze.

Then dreaming, I once more behold
The little home where I was born,
The purple blaze, the rippling gold
Of hill-sides rich with July corn;
And then, ah me! I wake forlorn
To want and work; and all I see
Are roofs, and spires, and my one tree!

The toilsome wheels, the restless feet,
The murmur in the stagnant air,
The dull length of the city street,
The dull round of the city wares,
Oppress me with a vague despair;
And still I weep, and work, and weep,
Sleep, half-awake—wake, half-asleep!

But when I think of fields and lanes
Warm with the perfumes of July:
And wooded slopes, and waving plains—
Then, for one glimpse of God's blue sky
I feel that I would gladly die—
Gladly lie down to rest and pray,
And with the sunset pass away.

CHAPTER XXXV.

BRAVO ANTINOUS!

THE two Pallenoys staid out, the one to act as judge, the other as time-keeper; and the time-keeper was to give the starting signal by firing a pistol.

In the mean while the eight competitors were ranged side by side, close under the ladies' platform, with the sleeves of their jerseys rolled up above the elbows, their arms drawn close to their bodies, and their clenched fists pressed against their chests—all lithe and eager-looking, like a pack of greyhounds. Of these, the two tallest and fairest were Saxon Trefalden and Sir Charles Burgoyne. Sir Charles was the handsomer man; but SAXON was a shade the taller, and something more than a shade broader across the shoulders.

Well might Miss Hatherton call him the golden-haired Antinous; only that he was Antinous on a grander scale than the famous Antinous of the Capitol—Antinous with Herculean possibilities of strength and speed.

With the exception of Lord Castletowers, whose jersey was of a creamy white, just the tint of his beard, the competitors drawn up, were each distinguished by the colors of their shirts. Saxon's was striped pink and white; Burgoyne's light blue and white; Vaughan's mauve and white; and so on.

All was ready. The course was clear; the spectators silent; the competitors drawn up, and waiting. Suddenly the time-keeper threw up his hand and fired in the air. At the same instant, as if shot from a bow, the eight runners sprang forward, and the race began.

They had not even started than Saxon took the lead, running lightly and steadily, with his head well up, and his curls dancing in the sun. He was observed during but little before and his running, and yet, at the first three or four bounds, he had gained a good ten feet on his companions. Next to come Castletowers, Vaughan, and Burgoyne, almost level with each other; and close after them, Edward Brandon, whose slightness of make and length of limb enabled him to run tolerably well for a short distance; but whose usual loose, lax style of movement knocked him up at the end of the first three hundred yards. Torrington, Greville, and Pelham Hay brought up the rear. In this order they ran the first round. At the second turn, however, just as they neared the ladies' platform, Castletowers made a rush to the front, and passed Saxon by some three or four feet. At the same instant Vaughan and Burgoyne perceptibly increased their pace, widening the space between themselves and the four last at every stride.

And now Brandon, who had for some seconds begun to show symptoms of distress, came suddenly to a stand-still; and, being passed by those in the rear, fell, pale and panting, to the earth.

In the mean while Saxon had in nowise quickened his pace when prompted to regain his lead; but kept on at precisely the same rate through out the whole of the second round. Just as they were beginning the third, however, and as the very point where Castletowers had made his rush, Saxon, without any apparent effort, bounded ahead, and again left his friend some three yards behind.

Torrington, Greville, and Hay now dropped out of the ranks, one by one, and gave up the contest; leaving only Saxon and Castletowers, Vaughan and Burgoyne on the ground. Presently the two latter came into collision, and went down as if they had been shot, but were on their feet again in the twinkling of an eye and flying on as before.

At the fourth round Castletowers brought himself up abreast with Saxon. At the fifth Burgoyne gave in, and Vaughan flagged obviously; but Castletowers again dashed forward, and again secured the lead.

A subdued murmur, that broke now and then into a cheer, ran round the course. Every eye was riveted upon the runners. Every head turned as they came, and was outstretched to follow them. The ladies rose on the platform and watched them through their glasses. There were only three now—a white shirt, a pink shirt, and a mauve; but white and pink divided the suffrages of the lookers-on, and nobody cared a straw for mauve.

Again the circuit was nearly completed, and they were approaching the finish. The next round would be the sixth and last. The interest of the moment became intense. The murmur swelled again, and became a shout; cheers were waved, handkerchiefs fluttered—even Lady Castletowers leaned forward with a glow of real excitement on her face.

On they came—the Earl first, in his white jersey, just as he had started, and without losing gasps, lips quivering, brows closely knitted, keeping up his lead gallantly, but keeping it by dint of sheer pluck and endurance alone. Saxon next—a little flushed, but light of foot and self-possessed as ever, as fresh apparently as when he first started, and capable of running on at the same steady rate for any number of miles that might be set before him. Vaughan last—coming up very fast, but twenty yards behind even the rear.

"I Good Heavens!" cried Miss Hatherton, half bewitched with impatience, "how can he let Lord Castletowers keep the lead?"

"Because can not help it," said Olimpia, scornfully triumphant. She had forgotten that Saxon was her chosen knight, and all her sympathies were with the Earl.

"Absurd! he has but to put out a little more speed and he must win. The Earl is nearly—There! there! there! will you tell you or? Bravo Antinous!"

They passed the platform; and as they passed Saxon leaded up with an ardent smile, waved his hand to Olimpia, threw up his head like a young war-horse, bounded forward as if the wings were really on his feet, and passed the Earl as easily as a man on horseback passes a man on foot. Till the moment arrived at the finishing-post for the rest, had been mere play to him. Till this moment he had not attempted to "put out his speed," and now that he did put it out, he flashed past the astonished spectators like a meteor. His feet seemed scarcely to touch the turf, his body seemed as if borne upward by a great roar of admiration burst from the crowd; and in the midst of the roar, before Lord Castletowers had got over a dozen yards of the distance, he had made the sixth round, and passed the winning post by several feet.

"Won by a hundred and eighty yards," said Pulteney, time-keeper. "Last round thirty-one seconds and a half. By Gad, though I've seen it myself, I can scarcely believe it!"

Saxon laughed, joyously.

"I could have done it almost as easily," said he, "if it had been up hill all the way."

And what did Olimpia Colonna say to her chosen knight when he received the prize from her hands, only to lay it the next moment at her feet? Doubtless she remembered in good time that Saxon was a Trefalden, and would forgot how disloyally her sympathies had strayed from him in the race. Doubtless her greeting had in it something poisonously sweet, subtle, intoxicating—to judge, at least, by the light in his face, as he bowed and turned away.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

ELTON HOUSE, KENSINGTON.

MR. ABEL KECKWITCH, with William Trefalden's private address in his pocket-book, felt much at disadvantage in the midst of the gilt with haughty Barbarossa prostrate at his feet. He took it for granted that there was some dark secret at the bottom of the mysterious affair. He knew quite well that a practical man like William Trefalden would never take the trouble to surround himself with mystery unless he had something to hide, and to that something Abel Keckwitch felt himself to be possessed the key. It never occurred to him that William Trefalden might possibly object to letting such loquacious drones as surveying clerks prate of his whereabouts for other than criminal reasons. If such an idea had been suggested to him he would have laughed it to scorn. To his own private astuteness would Mr. Kidd. Both the detective and the lawyer's clerk were too familiar with the dark side of human nature to allow for the moment that systematic mystery meant any thing less than undiscovered crime.

So Abel Keckwitch took his master's address home with him, fairly written out in Mr. Nicodemus Kidd's clear business hand, and exulted therein. He was in no haste to act upon the information folded up in that little slip of paper. It was not in the least his way to do any thing in any thing, least of all about so sweet a dish as revenge. It must be prepared slowly, tasted a little at a time, and made to last as long as possible. Above all, it must be carefully considered beforehand from every point of view, and be spoiled by no blunder at starting. So he copied the address into his commonplace book, committed it to memory, pondered over it, gloated over it, and fed his imagination on it for days before he proceeded to take any fresh steps in the matter.

"ELTON HOUSE, KENSINGTON."

Such was the address given to him by Mr. Nicodemus Kidd. "Elton House, Kensington;" and a word more—only a word less. It was an address that told nothing—suggested nothing. "Elton Villa" would have bespoken a neat, stuccoed establishment. The Grace-Gothic style. "Elton Lodge," a prim modern residence, with gardens, gates, and a carriage-drive; "Elton Cottage, an ivy-covered little place, shrinking back from the high-road, in a screen of lilacs and laburnums; but "Elton House" represented none of these to the mind's eye. "Elton House" might be ancient or modern, large or small, a cockney palace or a relic of the old court days. There was nothing in its name to assist conjecture in any way. Thus again, the query unsolved, and perplexing. Of all districts round about London there is none so diverse in its characteristics as Kensington—none so old in part, so new in part; so stately here, so squalid there; so of the country countrified in one direction, so of the town townly in another. Elton House might be any of these sorts of habitations for aught that one could gather from its name.

In short, Mr. Abel Keckwitch turned the address over in his mind much as some people turn their letters—holding them against their curiosity instead of gratifying it, and spelling out the motto on the seal instead of breaking it.

At length he made up his mind to go over to Kensington and reconnoitre the ground. Having come to this determination one Saturday afternoon (on which day, as practicable, Mr. Trefalden dismissed his clerks at five o'clock), Abel Keckwitch pushed forward with his work; closed the office precisely at five; and, Saxon's clock was striking, and instead of trudging as usual direct to Hemstead, he turned his face westward and hailed the first Hammersmith omnibus that came by.

It was a lovely afternoon; warm, sunny, summerlike. In the City's head clerk knew that the park trees were in all the beauty of their early leafage, and that the air beyond Charing Cross would be delicious; and he was sorely tempted to take a seat on the roof. But prudence prevailed. To risk observation would be to imperil the very end for which he was moving; so, with a sigh, he gave up the air and the sunshine, and took an inside place next the door.

The omnibus was filled, and, once closely packed, rattled merrily on till it drew up for the accustomed five minutes' rest at the White Horse Cellar. Then, of course, came the well-known wea-reader with the evening papers; and the unfortunate lady who will not go outside to oblige a lady—would prefer, in fact, to see a dozen ladies boiled first.

This interval over, off went out, the omnibus rattled on again to the corner of Sloane Street, where several passengers alighted; and thence proceeded at a leisurely pace down along the Kensington Road, with the green, broad park lying all along to the right, and row after row of stately terraces to the left.

"Put me down, conductor," said Mr. Keckwitch, "at the first turning beyond Elton House."

He had weighed every word of this apparently simple enough request, and purposely waited till the omnibus was less crowded before delivering it. He knew that the Kensington Road, taken from this point, with Kensington village in advance to end, up to that other point where Hammersmith is supposed to begin, covers a fair three miles of ground; and he wished to be set down as near as possible to the spot of which he was in search. But then it was necessary that he should not seem to be looking for Elton House, or going to Elton House, or inquiring about Elton House in any way; so he made a little speech with an ingenuity that was quite masterly as far as it went.

"Elton House, Sir?" said the conductor. "Don't know it. Never heard the name of the Street?"

Mr. Keckwitch took a letter from his pocket and affected to look for the address.

"Ah!" he replied, refolding it with a disappointed air, "I've lost the number. My directions only say, 'the first turning beyond Elton House.' I am a stranger to this part of London myself."

The conductor scratched his ear, looked puzzled, and applied to the driver.

"Any Elton House over Elton House?"

"Elton House?" repeated the driver. "Can't say I do."

"I think I have heard the name," observed a young man on the box.

"You may, for seen it somewhere," said another on the roof.

And this was all the information to be had on the subject.

Mr. Keckwitch's ingenious artifice had failed. Elton House was evidently not to be found with any inquiries—cherished though it must be made. It was annoying, but there was no help for it. Just as he had made up his mind to this alternative the omnibus reached Kensington gate, and the conductor put the same question to the toll-taker that he had put to the driver.

"Davy—know Elton House?"

The toll-taker—a shaggy fellow, with a fur cap on his head and a cigar in his mouth—pointed with his thumb over his shoulder, and replied,

"Somewhere down by Slade's Lane, beyond the westry."

On hearing which Mr. Keckwitch's countenance brightened, and he requested to be set down at Slade's Lane, wherever that might be.

Slade's Lane proved to be a narrow, winding, irregular by-street, leading out from the high-road, and opening at the farther end upon fields and market gardens. There were houses on only one side, and on the other high walls, with tree-tops peeping over, and here and there a side door.

The dwellings in Slade's Lane were of different degrees of smallness; scarcely two of the same height; and all approached by little slips of front gardens, more or less cultivated. There were lodgings to let, evidences of humble trades, and children playing about the gardens and doorsteps of many of them. Altogether, a more unlikely spot for William Trefalden to reside in could scarcely have been selected.

Having alighted from the omnibus at the top of this street, Mr. Keckwitch, after a hurried glance to left and right, chose the wall side and walked very composedly along, taking rapid note of each door that he passed, but looking as stolid and unobservant as possible.

The side doors were mostly painted of a dull green, with white numerals, and were evidently mere garden entrances to houses facing in an opposite direction.

All at once, just at that point where the lane made a sudden bend to the right, and turned off toward the market gardens, Mr. Keckwitch found himself under the shadow of a wall considerably higher than the rest, and close against a gateway flanked by a couple of stone pillars. His gaze encountered exactly the same when he turned turned, so that it blunted the angle, as it were, and commanded the lane in both directions. It was a high, massive wall, pointroyne, and studded with iron bosses, just wide enough, apparently, for a carriage to drive through, and many feet higher than it was wide. As it was a small wicket door. The stone pillars were time-stained and battered, and looked as if they might have been there ever since the days when William of Orange brought his Dutch court to Kensington. In one of them was a plain brass bell-handle. On both were painted, in faded and half illegible letters, the words, "ELTON HOUSE."

CONSTANCE KENT.

FIVE years ago the English public was startled from its usual quiet by a murder which appeared to be as mysterious as it was horrible. A young boy of four years old—FRANCIS SAVILLE KENT—was cut on the night of June 29, 1860, taken from his bed some distance down passages of stairs, and across the yard to a closet, where he was smothered and stabbed, and discovered the next morning wrapped in a blanket from his bed. The scene was laid at Road-hill House, Wiltshire, near Frome. Road-hill House was at one time inhabited by MR. KENT, who held the office of factory inspector. Including three servants, his family consisted of twelve persons. He had been married twice. By his first wife and her three children, there were in the house three daughters and a son by a former wife. The murdered child, FRANCIS SAVILLE KENT, belonged to the second family, and was four years old. CONSTANCE EMILIE KENT, the youngest daughter of the first family, was about fifteen. Why she should have possibly had any motive for so horrible a crime was beyond comprehension. An inquest was held upon the body two days after the murder.

It was found that on the night of the murder FRANCIS was sleeping as usual in a cot by the side of his nurse's bed, in a room on the second-floor. Early in the morning the servant discovered that he had been taken away, and that one of the pockets of his cot was also missing. According to her own statement she thought that her mistress must have fetched him, and it is certain that about half past seven o'clock she knocked at the door of Mr. and Mrs. KENT'S bedroom on the first-floor, and raised the boy. He was not there, however, and, although search was immediately made, it was some time before the body, wrapped in a blanket taken from the cot, was found in the privy opening from the garden. The throat was cut from ear to ear; there were two of the wounds on the body, and there were also marks of strangulation on the throat. There was nothing to show where the strangling or the stabbing respectively took place; but the wounds had obviously been inflicted in the privy, because a large quantity of blood was found there, and nowhere else. As one of the windows of the drawing-room on the ground-floor was open it was the last room of the child was discovered in. At first supposed that some one might have entered from without, and so have committed the crime. Most evidently the murder must have been committed by some one intimately acquainted with the house, else how could the murderer have found the way in the dark from the passage and through the yard to the outhouse? Besides, there was a fierce watch-dog in the yard, which would have given the alarm on the approach of a stranger. It was generally agreed that a girl or woman must have been concerned in the affair, because after the blanket in which the child's body was wrapped had been taken from between the sheet and counterpane, the latter had been folded down with a neatness and care that a man was unlikely to exhibit. The nurse-maid, out of whose room deceased was abstracted; the governess, who sometimes took the drawing-room fastenings the night before the murder, and found them undone; and the persons who discovered the dead body in the shed, were examined; but no facts throwing any fresh light upon the murder were elicited, and the barbarous affair still remained in inexplicable obscurity. After a five hours' inquiry the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown."

At this stage the inquiry was placed in the hands of Inspector WHICHER, of the London detective force, and a reward of two hundred pounds was offered for the detection of the murderer. No evidence was discovered throwing any suspicion on the house-maid or nurse-maid, and the latter, ELIZABETH GOUGH, who had been arrested, was released. Those who held that GOUGH was concerned in the murder made her an accomplice with MR. KENT. They supposed that a criminal intercourse existed between these two persons: that they had been disturbed by the cries of the child; that they had accidentally smothered it while simply trying to stifle the noise; and that they, or one of them, had afterward inflicted the wounds in order to throw the suspicion upon some one out of the house. But although ELIZABETH GOUGH was taken before the magistrates, only one item of evidence which affected her in the slightest degree could be produced. It was said that a piece of flannel found with the child exactly fitted the nurse's chest, and that the bore marks leading to the conclusion that it belonged to her. But, even assuming that this was so, the presence of the flannel near the body of the child by no means proved that it had been carried there by its owner. As far as the prosecution point of this theory—the alleged intimacy between the nurse and MR. KENT, it rested from first to last upon mere supposition, without any substantial proof.

In INSPECTOR WHICHER'S hands this mysterious murder entered upon a fearful and somewhat unexpected phase. Suspicion was now directed against CONSTANCE KENT, the half-sister of the murdered child. She was officially charged with the crime. The amount of direct proof was, however, very slight, that the charge was immediately dismissed. Still, what legal evidence there was tended more to exculpate the sister than the nurse. It was proved that she had surreptitiously abstracted her nightgown worn on the night of the murder from the weekly basket of linen prepared for the laundress. And some amount of motive was suggested. The girl CONSTANCE, mother by a child of sixteen, was known to be jealous of the children of the second marriage; and on an occasion—a recent one some domestic slight, real or fancied—she had run away from home disguised in boy's clothes, and in company with a younger brother. Other wild rumors, founded chiefly on her cool, low-voiced demeanor, scarcely presented sufficient solidity to divert legal attention from the nurse and sister. Public opinion, the general balance of sensible and public suspicion was rather against the father, while, as recorded CONSTANCE KENT—although in a measure made from the first little secret of their strong suspicions, amounting almost to certainty, against her—it pleased the latter sometimes to act in a generally evidence which existed, entirely to exonerate this interesting young lady. One so young and so fair, and so full of will stood the public gaze for the first of a witness in the charge against the nurse, and then of a principal in her own case, could not possibly be guilty.

The interest in the investigation was about this time diverted by the self-accusation of a domestic fellow. After his depositions had been taken the self-accuser began to seek for, and really succeeded in establishing, alibis. But this, of course, was, of course, only momentary; and it remained pretty certain that either CONSTANCE or her father committed the murder. Throughout the investigation one feature is prominent—an evident desire on the part of the legal and judicial authorities not to push the matter as against CONSTANCE. No pains were taken to find the missing night-dress; and although Inspector WHICHER, who was a very lengthy paper writing quite conclusively that CONSTANCE must have done the deed, yet no allusion was made to this document, which is given to-day for the first time made public. Much of the sympathy for the girl rested upon a belief that, if she had committed the crime at all, she had been induced on to it by unkindness and oppressive treatment at home—a belief which is now discredited by CONSTANCE'S own letter. The most important witnesses in the case—some of CONSTANCE'S school-companions—who might have disclosed the character of her feelings at her half-brother and the threats which they had heard her utter, were very partial in their testimony, telling not one half of what they knew. The father himself, without any doubt, was convinced of his daughter's guilt; but notwithstanding the fact that suspicion rested in a great weight, though unjustly, against himself, he preferred to sacrifice his own reputation rather than take any step to screen the convicted child from justice. He doubtless was instrumental in hiding the material evidence of her guilt. Counsel was also self protected to her own innocence, although she knew that her guilt was attributed to her father. In the examination of ELIZABETH GOUGH, on the preliminary examination, she exhibited a wonderful self-possession. Serene and calm, she stood amidst the wreck of the happiness of all belonging to her. She went through the terrible ordeal of her own accusation, and what ought to have been the more perilous charge of a father against a mother, without wincing; and, worst of all, she allowed the clouds of odious suspicion to gather and thicken around her father till he became a by-word and a loathed object of all but general suspicion. She permitted him to fall into contempt, and partially into hate, as made no sign. She was the poor victim of circumstances; she attracted love and sympathy, and the religious care of almost all. All this, which one would have thought might have stirred the heart of the coarsest and vilest profligate, she, the simple maiden of fifteen years, refused to do. It is enough to say that she would have been callously unmoved had EDWARD committed or her own father stood on the gallows. What she was on the morning of the murder she continued to be for five long years. With an iron will, and iron nerves, and an iron wrist, she lifted her own brother from the happy sleep of innocence—the brother whom she had fondled and played with a few hours before—and almost hacked his head off. Having disposed of her victim, and of every vestige of her crime, she quietly retired to bed, and stood the next morning among the horrified household with just that happy simulation of unconscious terror and pity which looked so natural. The line taken at that dreadful hour has been persistently and consistently maintained. Having succeeded so completely at the first start, she was not going to spoil her success by betraying the very slightest sense of human sympathy or remorse. We could almost believe that CONSTANCE KENT had studied DE QUINCY'S grim jest when he mused murder as one of the fine arts; for her crime may be set down as the very triumph and model of murders. Not a single indication can be unindered at all, still more that it should be murdered by its sister, still more that that sister should be found at all like the young CONSTANCE, and escaping, is a monstrous solecism in nature and mind; but that the circumstances should all long and most profoundly considered, and which no human being of the eating sister who strike, as the world says, should be found to fasten the guilt on her, when all make the name of CONSTANCE KENT infamous to all time.

On the 10th of August, 1863, CONSTANCE KENT a friendless girl, came to St. Mary's Hospital in Queen's Square, Brighton. Here she came under the care of MISS GREIG and FATHER GARDNER. In the course of their spiritual conversations with her they made her confess her crime. "I had been up," they made her confess her crime. "I had been up," said MISS GREIG, "first of all to speak to her on religious subjects, and something in the conversation made her tell me that she carried the child out of the house while it was sleeping, that she had left the house through the drawing-room window, and that she had returned to the house without aid of her crime. She said it was not from any dislike to the child, but it was revenge on her step-mother."

CONSTANCE KENT'S confession was necessarily to her trial, which took place on the 31st of July, 1865, at the Salisbury Assizes. The court was thronged to suffocation. In less than half an hour it was concluded. The proceedings were to commence at 10 o'clock, but at 9 o'clock the doors to the court was crowded in every part, many persons being utterly unable to gain admission. The Rev. A. WAGNER (Rector, Great Bedwyn, Wiltshire, and the institution at Brighton) occupied two conspicuous seats in court, and they were naturally objects of much attention. Great delay occurred in getting up to the last moment as to what particular course would be taken in the matter, and, indeed, when the prisoner was placed at the bar her plea of guilty, or had yielded to the solicitation of some friends to withdraw that plea, and to plead not guilty, there was a pause, very, were matters of uncertainty to most persons until within a few minutes of the prisoner being placed at the bar.

Mr. Justice WILLES having taken his seat on the bench, MISS CONSTANCE KENT was called into the dock. She was dressed in black, with a small black gauntlet gloves. The face was hidden by a black worsted veil, which she raised on being called upon to plead. She wore a dark straw hat, but her bonnet was adorned with a black bugle trimming. There was nothing striking about her personal appearance, and she would probably she be considered in ordinary society particularly lady-like, for her manners were quiet. Directly after she entered the dock MR. RODWAY, the solicitor of the family, stepped up to her, and entered into a short but apparently earnest conversation of a minute or two's duration.

Having been formally given in charge by the Governor of the county jail to the court the proceedings were commenced by the Clerk, who, addressing the prisoner, said: "CONSTANCE MARIE KENT, you stand charged with having willfully murdered FRANCIS SAVILLE KENT, at Road-hill House, on the 30th of June, 1860. How say you? are you guilty or not guilty?" She answered, in a low tone of voice, "Guilty." Judge WILLES asked her if she was sure that she understood what in having willfully, intentionally, and with malice, killed her brother. She answered that she was.

And you plead guilty to that?" asked the Judge. CONSTANCE hesitated.

"What is your answer?" asked the Judge.

Still she remained silent.

Repeating the charge as made in the indictment the Judge again asked, "Are you guilty, or not guilty?"

"Guilty," answered CONSTANCE.

Then said the Judge, "Let the plea be recorded."

The silence which followed was broken by MR. COLERIDGE, Queen's counsel, who said: "My lord, as counsel for the prisoner, acting on the prisoner's behalf, before your lordship passes sentence, I desire to say two things—first, solemnly in the presence of Almighty God, and before you, my lord, and on your own soul, she wishes me to say that the guilt is hers and that her father is entirely innocent; and, secondly, which I entreat your lordship to consider, that she was entirely instrumental at home, as she not with nothing there but tender and forbearing love; and I hope the knowledge that she has confessed, and it gives me a melancholy pleasure to be the organ of these statements for her, because on my honor I believe them to be true."

After that she had declared that she had nothing to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon her, Justice WILLES assumed the black cap and thus addressed the prisoner:

"CONSTANCE MARIE KENT, you have pleaded guilty to an indictment charging you with the willful murder of your brother FRANCIS SAVILLE KENT on the 30th of June, 1860. You have by this exercise that plea which you have deliberately put forward, and it is a satisfaction to me to know that it was not done until after having had the advice of counsel who would have freed you from this dreadful charge if you should have been freed thereof. I consequently, no doubt after having read the evidence in the depositions, and considering this is your first appearance in a criminal court, that you are the author of a really guilty person. The murder was one committed under circumstances of great deliberation. You left your bed, you must have removed your feelings of jealousy and anger to have worked in your breast until at last they assumed over you the influence and the power of the Evil One."

Mr. Justice WILLES here became deeply affected, and literally burst into tears, which prevented him from proceeding with his remarks for some minutes.

The prisoner at the bar, who up to this time had maintained the greatest composure, could no longer witness the proceedings with apparent indifference. As the Judge spoke of her having been influenced by "jealousy and anger" she exclaimed, "Not jealousy!" and, suddenly turning her head from the Judge she burst into a flood of tears, which were audible in every part of the court, and produced the most profound sensation upon all who were witnesses of this most affecting scene.

"Whether that feeling, by which alone the aggravative of mercy rests, may be advised to consider the long time which has elapsed since when the murder was committed, and the fact that you were convicted chiefly upon your own confession, which I never suspicion of others, is a question which it would be presumption for me to answer here. It well behooves you to live what is left of your life as one who is about to die, and to seek a more enduring mercy, by sincere and deep contrition, and by a reliance upon the only redemption and satisfaction for all the sins of the world. It only remains for me to discharge the duty which the law imposes upon the court which I represent, and that is to pass upon you the sentence which the law adjudges to be the punishment for willful murder: That you be taken from the place where you now stand to the place whence you came, from thence to the place of execution, and that you be hanged by the neck until your body be dead, and that your body be dead it be buried within the precincts of the jail in which you were last confined; and may God have mercy on your soul!"

When the concluding words of the awful sentence were being pronounced a profound impression was manifested. A limb, not a muscle, quivered, and though there was not a dry eye in the assembly the prisoner at the bar was the only person who received her sentence in a manner which was perfectly astounding, and which caused the greatest sensation in the court. MR. JUSTICE WILLES had concluded, and the prisoner turned round to the female warder who had accompanied her into the dock, and who was behind it, and with such an unfaltering step she descended the flight of stairs into the cell below.

Many were disappointed because the prisoner plead guilty, having hoped to satisfy a natural curiosity to hear the details of the murder. MARY HOLE, the lad who think that the plea ought not to have been accepted as conclusive. It is known that in capital cases in Ireland the plea of would not be improbable thing that she should have been led by some strange impulse to make a false confession. Still the evidence was strong against CONSTANCE KENT, possible for the Judge to set aside the plea. Nor is it there any reason to doubt the guilt of CONSTANCE KENT.

QUEEN VICTORIA, at the advice of the Home Secretary, has commuted the sentence of CONSTANCE KENT to transportation for life. There are certainly features connected with this girl's history which in fiction would hardly be considered probable. It would also appear to us that the Road-hill murder has become any the less mysterious even now that CONSTANCE KENT has confessed and has come under the penalty of the law.

GEORGE THIEVES.—Darkness as an ore pickpockets in finding pocket handkerchiefs, stealing purses, and practising other delicate manipulations, and as a cover to bold and ingenious, and, strange to say, there is seldom any interference with them by the seizure of a watch or robbed or the capture of the robber. A shop-keeper will have his pocket picked in the midst of the most imposing depredations at his very door, but will probably laugh at and encourage the thief instead of summoning the police who, unmolested, carries off his prey. A single thief has been known to steal a dozen watches in the day, having conveyed within it, the bearers (they but being accomplices) of the stolen goods, and so secure an interest in the shopping and looking on while the nefarious deed was done. Such a thief will not steal a watch in the hand of a stranger. It was seized upon many delicacies, and, as usual, there was an unfailing supply of fruit. The sun had gone down, the wax-candles were lighted, the windows left open for the admission of air, and the entertainment, a great number of bankers were seen to enter on all sides of the house. The whole of the ground-floor was thrown into one apartment, and from the bunches of grapes, and the pine-apples which hung from the bamboo hollow tubes. The apartment was filled with the most delicious fragrance, issued or to the main land of China, no trace was ever found of the unfortunate Miss Waldron.

If, in the hand which you aspire to, the fingers are long, tapering, and delicate, without knobbiness, then they will play you Mozart or Beethoven, arrange your flower-vases in graceful forms, or write a sensation novel —but certainly not mend your shirts; their owner will have the vagrant propensities of the artistic and beautiful bibs, or of the capabilities of the magic $100 a year in the kitchen. If the fingers are coarse you may marry a happy ever afterward." If on the contrary, they are short and fleshy, with a tendency to dimpling order, arrangement" you must indulge no visions of highly refined taste, but you will become one to wear out the buttons, to exercise a strict regimen over the domestic economy, and subsist for many years on little else than the strictest rules of arithmetic.

THE RISE.—The epoch of Louis Quatorze was the epoch of great men, great ideas, great things, because it was also the epoch of large noses. The epoch of the Regency, on the contrary, was the epoch of little men, little art, little things, because it was the epoch of little noses, of snub-noses, of turned-up noses. All great times, all great epochs, all great things, have had a tendency to long noses. The nose is the ladder of the human frame only that leads to the brain. The snub-nose is a nose put forward direct to his goal without looking to the right hand or to the left. It is the nose of the man who, when he has once turned up, use advances by tacking in a zigzag line, fluttering to and fro like a butterfly. This is the reason why children, apostates, and sinners, have no stability of character, in fact have no character at all, but laugh and cry and slay without cause, and just as chance directs them. All the generals of the Order of Jesuits have been long-nosed to a man. The order indeed is only remitted from men with long noses. All founders of empires and systems have been remarkable for their long straight noses, such as Alexander the Macedonian, Augustus Cæsar, Napoleon, Aristotle, Moses, Mohammed, and Ignatius Loyola. Socrates, indeed, had little to boast of in this respect, but Plato, Aristotle, Hegel, Plato, made up for his deficiency, and had nose enough for both.

A CASE is recorded in books on forensic medicine of most singular disease. The swallowed a piece of sponge root, which, from its horizontality, and had occasion to sit down, absorbed the surrounding moisture so much that it swelled to such an extent that the nose from the part it could no longer feel; and when the sponge was taken out it was found to be completely decomposed. In the course of time, however, the patient was cured by the operation, greater was their surprise to discover feeling to have departed from their palms and fingers also.

CONCERNING MARRIAGE.—In England, at the year 1860, eleven men married who were neither bachelors nor widowers, and eleven women who were neither spinsters nor widows. Half of these twenty marriages of divorced persons took place in London. The second state the exact age of nearly two-thirds of the couples married in the year, but the information is nothing remarkable in the disclosure. More than three-fourths, both of the men and the women were under thirty. But there were nine entries that certainly are rather remarkable. For instance, two of the women were married spinsters who were not thirty-five; and a girl of sixteen was married to a man between sixty and seventy. Two hundred and forty-eight men married who were only sixteen years old, and thirty-three women under the same age—sixteen. Eighty youths of sixteen must seeks take to themselves wives, all rather wishes to marry women. The days of our years are twelve years and ten; but this return shows us one hundred and twenty-seven men of forty-two years and upwards what is called a new start in life after they had reached the age of forty. Eight of these men married women who were under twenty. Eight of the women married, and three of the women were under fourteen of the men. Four eighty-two years of age. Two of the women may be noted as instances of ninety-two marrying a woman of eighty-one.

THE FIREBRANDS.—When a gentleman of irregular habits, of ill-governed mind, and inclinations not governed at all, marries a lady of a pretty face and fine complexion, and can not gain possession of these treasures except by submitting to the yoke which he can not shake off, and the influence of his old loose ways returns upon him there is no hope for him which he can call his own. He is the who, from being an object of attraction, has become an object of indifference, and finally forty-by treats with neglect, respect, and cherishing, he has only to display his natural character, dislike, and positive hatred. The transition is not difficult to such a nature, and the lapse of a few months will generally suffice to put on the complete mask of life. The indignant wife, insulted, wronged, treated with cruelty, cruelty, and ignominy, has no redress for the discredition of her marriage. The cause is generally attributed to incompatibility of temper, and what the husband wants. He is freed from his bond. If the wife is a woman, she has a more pleasing form for his wife's, and finds the new lady willing, he has no need to be at the trouble of a divorce, or to go to the Continent. He has only to wear out his wife's patience, and supply the fuel which causes one to go to the Divorce Court. The number of husbands who have been alive to this advantage is very great. It is a fine thing for them.

THE COWS AND MILKMAIDS OF HOLLAND.—The most important branch of production of the cause is the dairy of cattle. These are of a native breed peculiar to the country, and from the richness of the pasture they yield the milk so from the laudable propensity of the beef to accumulate on their sides. Cows are worth a handsome price per pound, are greatly valued by the people. They are generally of a dun color, with white spots, are seen about the kitchens, and far nearer than some of them. The majority of the peasantry, in our own country, are more accommodated with such good quarters. When they are taken to pasture they are tied to stakes with long ropes, which, in the dampness of the soil should cause disease of that part; but they are so carefully carried and brushed and watched, while in summer they are covered with cotton cloths, that they may not suffer from the flies, that they rarely do. winged Zouaves that despoil us of one of our night's rest. The cows are protected from the cold by wooden sheds. On their way to the fields they are attended by milkmaids or peasant women, sometimes by the men, and are that their tempers are not ruffled, and show the most affectionate regard for their welfare. The milkmaids have not suffered the race of milkmaids to die out as we have; and one can hardly imagine a prettier or more picturesque person between the present time and the old in this respect in our own country. Her great fault seems to be between those who, in the days of our ancestors, used to sing about her, and the days of our ancestors, used to be beads, and after their day's labors were over did nothing with dance with the rustic swain to the rustic music tricks around flower-crowned May-poles, and that grusty fellow the village curmudgeon, who has not yet quite disappeared light, as if he were ashamed of himself, and leaves a wisdom heart of wood and of stalk, after the manner of the Dutch in order to mix it!

HERRING.—For a bright night twenty minutes nearly pass at any part of the earth's surface without the appearance of an aerial meteor. Between the 9th and 13th of August and the 14th of November they appear in enormous numbers. The ancient Greeks knew that they were described as falling as thick as snow-flakes, two hundred and fifty thousand meteors were counted in this. The number falling in a very night, perhaps, be estimated at hundreds of thousands. Humboldt says that the world constitute but a small portion of the total crowd of meteoric dust circulating around the sun. The phenomenon of light and heat, and by direct observations on Ericke's observe, we learn that the zodiacal light is the existing meteium ithe ether, through the friction of which all the bodies of our system are gradually retarded in their motion. And though the larger planets show, in historic times, no diminution of their velocity, yet the smaller ones, by interaction with the smaller bodies in the time required for the mean distance of the earth to alter a thousand miles, a small asteroid may have approached thousands of miles nearer to the sun.

BARKING OF DOGS.—Dogs in a state of nature never bark; they only howl. The bark of the dog is an artificial noise is only found among those which are domesticated. Spanish pointers, which were brought from the wilds of Egypt as not having this faculty; and Columbus found the dogs of the islands previously carried to discovers to have lost their propensity to barking. The ancients were aware of this fact, Xenophon says that dogs are the kind watchmen of forest to these animals: "They are dumb—for any of them to bark in the enemies' camp." Pliny assigns the noise of his enemies to the "dogs round about the city." Cicero the Greeks and Romans had no barking dogs. The art to speak which he derives from his associating with man.

THERE is no part of creation where freedom and happiness would appear to be enjoyed so perfectly as in the world of air—as life so enviable, considered on the whole, as the life of a bird. The motion of flight must be itself a sensation of exquisite pleasure, conferring as it does the power of rapid and unimpeded and almost unlimited motion on those creatures who possess it—a sensation in which all animals admit, including man, appear to delight. The life of a bird must be as a fairy tale, which one has only dreamed of, but never realized, and never will. A pang of disappointment to find himself still bound to the earth, and to all the trammels of the earth, must be something almost Divine in its enjoyment.

BABELS AND CABLES.

WHEN men of old so vainly tried
To build a tower unto heaven,
A monument of human pride
To all posterity was given.

No Babel sounds, at present day,
Attest the force of God's decree;
But Silence sits upon the way
That man would build across the sea.

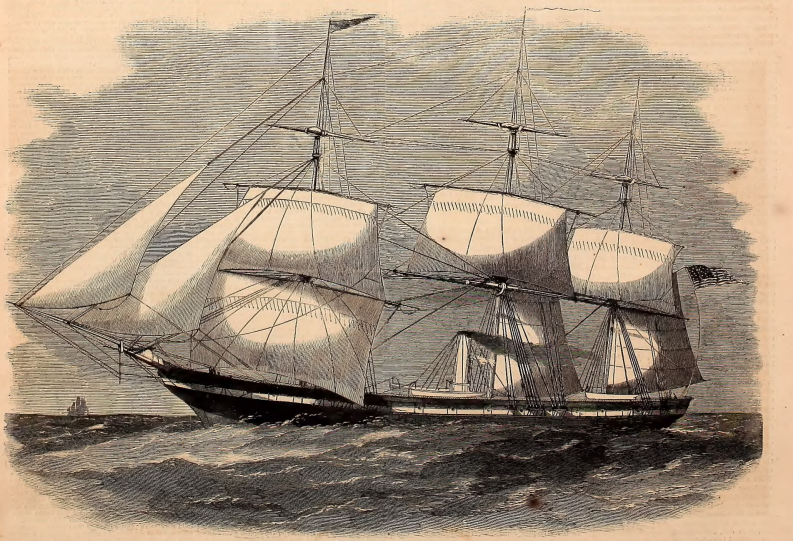
REAR-ADMIRAL BELL.

ACTING REAR-ADMIRAL HENRY H. BELL, about to assume the command of the United States naval forces in the East Indies, is a native of North Carolina, from which State he entered the naval service August 4, 1823. Passing through the grades of Midshipman, Passed-Midshipman, and Lieutenant, he was made a Commander in 1854, and was soon after ordered to the United States ship San Jacinto, destined for the East Indies, as the flag-ship of Commodore JAMES ARMSTRONG.

During the service of the San Jacinto on the China station the English managed to improvise a quarrel with the Chinese authorities, and in conjunction with their French allies were waging war upon that people. Pending these vexatious and irritating hostilities, a boat from the United States ship Portsmouth, proceeding up the Canton River, was fired upon from the barrier forts. Commodore Armstrong determined very promptly to punish this insult to our flag, and an attack was made upon the forts by the United States sloops of war Portsmouth and Levant, Commanders FOOTE and SMITH, and the boats of the San Jacinto, Commander BELL. Considering the strength of the works, the number of guns and of the garrison, and the smallness of the assailing party, the result was almost incredible. After long and obstinate fighting the Chinese troops were routed, their works captured and thoroughly destroyed.

A modest granite shaft at the Brooklyn Navy-yard commemorates the event and the names of the brave men who were slain in the contest.—Throughout this operation Commander BELL, as testified to by the lamented FOOTE, was conspicuous for his cool, deliberate gallantry, exhibiting always the sterling qualities of an accomplished officer.

REAR-ADMIRAL HENRY H. BELL.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]



When the rebellion broke out Commander BELL, although a Southerner, promptly offered his services to the National Government, and sought active duty. When Admiral (then Commodore) FARRAGUT was ordered to the command of the West Gulf squadron, he selected Commodore BELL as his Fleet Captain. In this confidential and responsible position he was a prominent participant in the grand and thrilling events which culminated in the destruction of the rebel fleet, the capture of New Orleans, and the opening of the Mississippi. When Admiral FARRAGUT came North to recruit his health and prepare for the next and final struggle with the enemy in Mobile Bay, he left the command of the West Gulf squadron with Commodore BELL. A brave, modest man, a patriotic and accomplished officer, a courteous and conscientious gentleman, few can show and none deserve a better record.

The Hartford, which is to be the flag-ship of the East India squadron, and in which Admiral BELL set sail, has a history of which she may well be proud. She was the flag-ship of Admiral FARRAGUT in the celebrated fight in Mobile Bay. Every beam in her is loyal and true. May her future be as fortunate as her past is glorious!

PARIS FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.

FOR dress at bathing and watering places the summer toilets of the present season have undergone but little modification, and in all their principal features remain the same as last year. The most fashionable materials are the light silks and the spotted muslins generally employed for the complete costume. For the sake of variety, a black or blue silk casaque may be worn with advantage; the blue casaque is especially charming for young or fair persons.

Among the host of bonnets invented by the inexhaustible ingenuity of the Parisian modistes, the chapeau Empire, for ceremonial purposes, are the adopted favorites. They are simply ornamented with a swallow, a colibri, or a bird's wing placed upon corn or upon a little verdure; as for gold and steel ornaments and spangles, they are no longer patronized. In the way of fancy hats, round black straw chapeaux with white or blue feathers, and yellow straw with black feathers, are the most distingué.

An agreeable innovation is the general adoption of white, blue, or green gauze veils for all descriptions of bonnets. They should be very long, and be thrown on one side, so as to drape gracefully, and not be turned over the bonnet, when desired to be removed while in conversation, or for greater freedom of respiration. Even with fancy hats we have seen many of these graceful veils, a yard long, worn with much advantage, particularly by youthful ladies.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Plain slate-colored foulard robe. Blue silk casaque, open at the sides and trimmed round the edge and on the corsage with black passementerie. The small and simple bonnet is in blue crape, ruched, but without any other ornament.

Fig. 2. Morning Dress.—Nankeen-colored taffeta robe, ornamented over the seams and round the bottom of the skirt with black silk pinked ruching; the corsage à basques is trimmed over the seams in a corss-pealing manner. Rice-chip bonnet, ornamented with black lace and ears of Indian corn.

Fig. 3. Dress for the Sea-side.—The whole of this toilet is in very light gray muslin. The skirt is drawn up, and ornamented on each width by blue silk cording, finishing with tassels. The lower jupe, as well as the simple capucin scarf, are also trimmed with blue silk cording. Pale rose-colored parasol, with carved wooden handle.

Fig. 4. Dress for a Little Boy.—All this costume is in gray jean, the long vest and the trousers being ornamented with stripes of red worsted. The double-pointed waistcoat is fastened with coral buttons. The cravat and the band round the black straw Derby hat are both in scarlet silk.

ON LOOSENESS IN DRESS.

FIVE years ago what mother, with any the least pretension to moral character, would have allowed a daughter to expose herself to the public gaze, dressed, etc., after the fashion which has of late prevailed? and yet how many a mother has so put forth her daughters! There is no little lamentation, year after year, over the habits and principles of the men of the day. It is not only a subject of maternal woe that they don't care to marry—that they care not to have it seen and known that they have ties which go far to explain the fact; but there is also a growing indisposition on their part to seek the society of the young of their own rank. It is hard work now to obtain the presence of young men at any of the social assemblies which, in former days, were the great fields of matrimonial enterprise. There is no denying that the young men of these days have been either lured out of their love for the balls and assemblies to which of old they used to flock, to the satisfaction of mothers and the enjoyment of daughters, or they have been in some way disgusted with the prevailing habits of such scenes. If ladies choose to follow a fashion in dress which outrages all decency, from its liberal exposure in young and old of so much which, in the case of the latter, is disgusting to the observer, and in the former can only attract the eye to pain the mind—if young and old are alike to be got up for public exhibition, with all the aid the arts of the Rachel profession can afford, it is easy to understand why it is that, after all, the performance falls of its lofty artistic aim—attraction. Such modesty affects the millinery and sacks all the cunning aid which the immodest use to attract we are left to one or other of two conclusions. The victim of such folly either thinks men will admire in a wife what they only endure in a mistress, or are so weak as to believe that one desirable as a wife, by nature and education, can continue so after adopting the outward character of what should be an abhorrence to her true self as opposed to every principle her education ever afforded. We have many follies, and there is no one in which we can afford to be foolish. But the modest heart of one sister and daughter is a matter in which all have an interest. It is one which can yield to no other in national importance. The wanton extravagance originating in the love of personal decoration is in itself an evil of no little magnitude; it is crippling the resources of many a family, laying the foundation for the ruin of many a home. But, however, is a minor evil compared with that degradation of inward purity and refinement which this offensive attention to personal display produces. It is bad enough to expose the young daughters of our highest educated and wealthy classes to the temptation of moral danger to which they must be liable when we take them out, day after day and night after night, on the World's great errand—seeking their settlement as wives. It was scarcely needed that we should have them carefully impressed with the duty of personal display and so artificially equipping themselves that, just out of the school-room, they are to appear in public got up to attract attention, after the pernicious habits of the world—a moral degradation they are as yet happily incapable of understanding.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

RECONSTRUCTION.

A LETTER has been published, addressed by General J. D. Cox, July 25, to Messrs. B. H. Fairchild and Samuel Plumb, of Oberlin, on the subject of negro suffrage. General Cox is one of the candidates for Governor in the State of Ohio, and his views on the subject are of great importance. Mr. Fairchild and Mr. Plumb question the strongest language. Their questions are: "Do you say that the right to vote is allowed to the late enemies of the country by the President?" "Do you say that the people on the subject that they could not be trusted to determine it for themselves, but are to be opposed to it." General Cox, in his reply, states his views very briefly, although he has given the most action on that subject premature. He says, moreover, that if these views prevailed in the next Legislature to which he belonged he should consider it his own duty to yield to the opinion of the majority in the spirit of harmonious action on more vital points. General Cox, in the same letter, expresses himself in favor of some general principles, asserted in the "Fennell Hall Address," as principles which would in any case be relied upon by the entire party:

First—That the political power must be put beyond all question that the republic has a direct claim upon the allegiance of every citizen, which no States can discharge him from, and to his obedience to the laws of the republic, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Second—The public faith is pledged to every person of color in the rebel States to secure to them and to their posterity freedom and equitable civil rights; and that having provided them their freedom, secured their aid on the faith of this pledge, and by a sanctioned act of war, every military occupation of the country having obtained the power to secure to them, we are dishonored if we do not make it good to them.

Third—That the system of slavery must be abolished and prohibited by paramount and irreversible law. Throughout the rebel States there have been in the past but two ways, "the supposed upon the will itself as inability to bear up for freedom."

Fourth—The systems of the States must be truly republican.

The application made of the last principle to the Administration of Cox does not consider enough. General Cox makes issue with many of his party on the mutual relation of the black and white races to each other. He says: "You judging from the distance say, 'Deliver the four millions of negroes into the hands of their former oppressors, now embittered by their defeat, and they will make their condition worse than before.' I, without using the same principles, and after four years of close and thoughtful observation of the race myself, say no; I am unwillingly forced to this conviction that the effort of war has not changed the negro's condition for the worse, to develop a rooted antagonism which makes their permanent fusion in the political community an impossibility. The General, therefore, advocates the peaceable separation of the two races by the antagonistic elements of color. The master hates the slave from pride, and fixes upon him all the bitterness which the war has engendered; and the slave hates the master from distrust and from the remembrance of past wrongs.

There must, says General Cox, be a struggle for the supremacy, in which one race or the other must go to the wall. But how is the separation to be provided for? General Cox does not deem it necessary to touch upon the organization of any State. He suggests that we take contiguous territory in South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, and organize the freedmen in a dependency of the Union under, as the Western Territories, a free-living benefit, he claims, would result from the scheme:

1. The slave would have his political rights freedom without onerous terms.

2. The representation of the Southern States would be reduced to a proper basis—their own numbers.

3. The jurisdiction of the Government and the administration of the people.

4. The Provisional Provisional Governor Marvin of Florida issued his proclamation to the people of that State. He does not resign the officials who served under the rebel régime.

THE COLLISION ON LAKE HURON.

On the evening of August 9, the propeller Pewabic, Captain McKay, on her down trip, about six miles from shore, came in collision with the propeller Meteor, Captain Wilson, on her up trip. The Meteor struck the Pewabic just under the funnel, literally passing through her. The boats were running at the rate of about twelve miles per hour. The result was several killed and injured, the latter unable to go down in the short space of three or four hours. The Meteor was not much damaged, however, and but few passengers of the Pewabic were induced to jump from her decks on to those of the Meteor on the dash of the Pewabic sank entirely out of sight, disappearing under. It was raining when the collision occurred, and very dark. About one hundred were lost. It is thought that the accident resulted from criminal carelessness.

ON THE RIO GRANDE.

Scarcely any event since the close of the war has caused greater surprise than the recent order of the War Department reducing the numbers of Sheridan's army. Steadily for weeks that army had been increasing, and had become the centre of all eyes and the occasion of much speculation. Suddenly the order came to muster out—and that hardly be less than half of the army that got together. Has the Government secured its object peaceably, and has harmony been restored between France and this country on the basis of the Monroe Doctrine?

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

On the Housatonic Railroad a distressing calamity occurred August 15. A passenger train was run into by a locomotive near Bridgeport, Connecticut. One car was split in two and the rear half was thrown down a precipice, when there was added to the disaster already incurred a terrific conflagration, by which fifty passengers outright and mortally wounding eleven others.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

The First Fruit has arrived at Harbor Grace. On August 3, at 4 o'clock A.M., she left Valentia, Ireland, and the Terrible. Two hours later she saw a beacon buoy with a flag-pole and cross-trees. On August 4, at 7 A.M., the Terrible discovered she learned from the captain that his cable parted August 2. This intelligence is hopeful. It indicates that leaving ill weather the cable had been put on board, and that the captain had no reason to sing about in order at the first favorable opportunity to take up the cable and continue the cable after the fault. At the time of parting two-thirds of the cable had been payed out. The Terrible was to be at Valentia again in due course.

The result of the municipal elections in France are thought on the whole to have been favorable to the Government.

A new Austrian cabinet has been formed, with Count Belcredi at its head, as minister of the interior. There is also appear to be unable to come to an agreement on the old subject of Venetia. Meanwhile, the Austrian army there is being daily reduced.

The war between Brazil and Paraguay still continues to the government of Brazil has issued a decree declaring a blockade of the Paraguayan ports on the Paraguay River, which takes effect on the 1st of that month on the Paraná River, by which Buenos Ayres, one of the United States, on both sides, the Brazilians claiming the victory. The Paraguayans had captured the town of San Borgia, on the Uruguay River, and it is reported that they put to death the Brazilian prisoners. The forces of the Allies, 50,000 Brazilians strong, and the Paraguayans at Corrientes, and after a long and bloody engagement the Paraguayans defeated. They were immediately after compelled to retire, in consequence of ascertaining that the reinforcements of the allied armies were near at hand. In the mean time large bodies of troops on both sides were hurried to the scene of hostilities, and other severe battles have no doubt already been fought. The Brazilian army, numbering 50,000 men, is under the Confederation, and Uruguay was definitively ratified on the 14th of June.

ANOTHER SEWING MACHINE ESTABLISHMENT.—

The advent of ELIAS HOWE, JR.'s, Sewing Machine Establishment on Broadway, corner of 14th, is an advent of interest, inasmuch as he is known to the public as the originator of the first sewing machine. His machine comes with the prestige of the maker's name and its established excellence. He is a thoroughly practical mechanic, and has passed all his long and necessary familiarity with the business peculiarly qualifies him to judge of the public wants, and how far they can be supplied. His manufactory is established at Bridgeport, Connecticut, near that of WHEELER & WILSON, which it rivals in size, and surpasses in completeness of all the arts of management. The machine itself has merited and received the highest awards at other fairs, including the World's Fair at London, in 1862, and in advantageous comparison with any of its class. For leather work, or for the heaviest manufacturing purposes, it is unsurpassed, and we predict for it a success second to none of its kind.—[Communicated.]

"AMERICA EVER VICTORIOUS.—The battle-fields of NAPOLEON I. were scarcely more numerous than the contests of the WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine Co. Forty in 1861, London in 1862, and Koenigsburg, 1863, Dantzic, Agram, and Krems, 1864, and Stettin, Cologne, and Wismar, 1865, bear equal testimony to the unrivalled excellence of their invention and its appreciation abroad. At all these International Exhibitions the best fruits of foreign genius were arrayed against it, backed by home industry property; but there, as here, the star of its destiny is always in the ascendant.—[Communicated.]

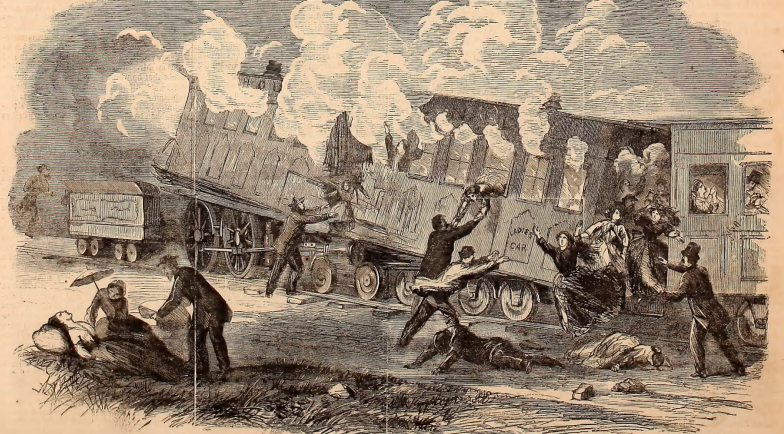
THE HOUSATONIC RAILROAD SLAUGHTER.

AGAIN we have to record a railroad accident, involving the wholesale slaughter of passengers, and caused by the carelessness of the railroad officers.

On the 14th of August the passenger train of the Housatonic Railroad left Bridgeport about fifteen minutes after 10 o'clock, a little behind time. An extra freight train had been sent out in the morning. This latter train broke down, and was overtaken by the passenger train about six miles from Bridgeport. The passenger train was backed down slowly. The conductor, H. L. PECKH, went to the rear end of the train, and, standing on the platform, saw an engine approaching and within ten rods of the train. Pulling the bell for the engineer to stop, PECKH and the President, Mr HOYT, who was with him, jumped from the train, and had scarcely got off before the collision. The car struck by the engine was nearly annihilated. It was full, having forty or forty-five passengers on board. The conductor went round, and went in at the front door of the rear car, but found the heat so intense that he could not remain. The engine had penetrated to about the centre of the car, and the escape of steam was so great as to suffocate and scald many of the unfortunate passengers.



By this accident five persons were killed outright, and some others died soon after. One of these was a little boy ten years old, who was on his way home from a visit, having been recalled by his mother's death. Another—an old lady of 73—had just been visiting her son. Over twenty passengers were wounded more or less seriously. The regulations of the road in regard to the use of red flags were not complied with, and hence the accident. Is it not worth while to save half a score of lives by taking the simplest precautions laid down for such case, even if it does require a little painstaking on the part of railroad officers?

CANNIBALS IN HAYTI.

WE print on page 557 an illustration of the execution in Hayti of several cannibals—an event which took place last year. MR. REDPATH, in an interesting article which we publish this week on the Revolution in Hayti, speaks of the barbarous character of SOULOUQUE and his followers of to-day. As an instance of this inherent barbarity, it is sufficient to state the fact that when SOULOUQUE ascended the throne he accorded protection to that most monstrous and unnatural sect of superstitious fanatics known as the devotees of Vaudioux, or Snake-worshipers. One of the rites of their religion is that of human sacrifice. TOUSSAINT, DESSALINES, and later PETION and BOYER, opposed this sect. SOULOUQUE was as superstitious as he was cruel, and believed that he had gained his empire by the aid of the snake. After his expulsion the sect was prudently suppressed. But last year it gave a most bloody token of its existence. The devotees began their horrid festival by an act of cannibalism. The monsters, after having stuffed and devoured one unfortunate child, were about to commit the same outrage upon a second victim when justice overtook them. As an example several of the cannibals were executed, February 7, 1864.

COLLISION ON THE HOUSATONIC RAILROAD, NEAR BRIDGEPORT, CONNECTICUT, AUGUST 14, 1865.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1865.

THE COLLECTOR OF NEW YORK.

THE appointment of PRESTON KING as Collector of the port of New York, one of the most politically significant national appointments in the State, shows that President JOHNSON has no intention of separating his administration from the great national Union party which nominated and elected him. As we remarked some time ago, Mr. KING was one of the most strenuous and persistent supporters of Mr. JOHNSON in the Baltimore Convention; and since Mr. JOHNSON'S accession to the Presidency he has had no reason to believe that he could have had no more patriotic counsellor than PRESTON KING.

Mr. KING in the old distribution of parties was a Democrat. But when it became clear to sagacious and honest men of that party that its name and prestige and organization were to be prostituted to the destruction of the Democratic principle by an alliance between the advocates of State sovereignty and slavery on the one hand, and Northern spoilsmen on the other, PRESTON KING followed the Democratic principle out of the Democratic party, and by his proved conviction, his honesty of character, and political experience and sagacity, became a leader in the organization which, under another name than that of his old party, maintained the Democratic American principle of equal rights. For the present overwhelming triumph of true national ideas no man has worked more assiduously and unwearingly than he. Among the many true and good he richly deserves the national gratitude. Mild and urbane, but unwavering, his voice and vote, his time and talents, have been consecrated to the task of withstanding that spirit of caste, exclusiveness, secionalism, and aristocracy, which, under the name of Democracy, has long striven to demoralize the national conscience, and which, by the grace of God and the will of the American people, has been thus far baffled.

What the special influences of Mr. KING'S appointment were we do not know. That it indicates the ascendency of this or that politician is a mere speculation. The important point is, that his elevation to so marked a political position—for such the collectorship of New York necessarily is—signifies the President's approval of his views and course, and the harmony of the President with his party.

This party, composed of the great body of unswerving Unionists—men who never doubted the justice of the war; who never believed, with the supporters of the Chicago nominations, that the war was a failure; who never refused to recognize the rebel debt, nor to repudiate that of the country; men who believe in the natural right of every man to life, liberty, and the fruits of his own labor; who hold to the sovereignty of the Union and not of the States; and who do not regard the Constitution as a contract between certain independent States, but as a fundamental law adopted by the people of the United States, establishing a nation;—this party will usually have different views as to the best methods of securing the permanent ascendency of th ir principles. But they will still remain practically a unit.

There there is no difference among them as to the fact of emancipation. They all hold that the slaves are free, nor will they permit them to be re-enslaved by any legislative or judicial action. What the United States have done, no single State will be suffered to undo. Again they are, with a unanimous voice in the election, that a republican government is justly founded upon the consent of the governed, and, consequently, that the electoral qualifications should be the same for every citizen. Arbitrary exclusion from political power they oppose as unjust, and therefore dangerous. The color of the skin they believe should no more debar a man from his political rights than the color of his hair. An American citizen of African descent has precisely the same political rights as an American citizen of European descent. As a party, therefore, although with many individual exceptions, they are unalterably in favor of what is called colored suffrage. But they differ as to the immediate necessity and the practical methods of giving the franchise to the colored citizens of the late rebel States; while they are probably agreed that it would be best if it were given by the white citizens of those States. They differ, too, as to the theories as to the present exact condition of the unorganized States.

There is, therefore, no serious practical difference in the great Union party. And the President, whom they elected, manifests no serious difference with them. The expectation of the supporters of Mr. PENDLETON and the Chicago platform that they can manipulate Mr. JOHNSON to their purposes is a delusion. If upon the point of the admission of Southern representatives to Congress the Union party should divide, one part of it will go with the President; and if the Chicago party, which is merely the remains of the old Southern party, —choose to unite with them they will do so; but in that case they will go to the President, he will not come to them. Whether it be desirable for the best interests of the country that the administration should confide itself to such a coalition rather than to the party welded together by common conviction and co-operation during the war, and which is now the vast majority of the country, is not a question. There can be no doubt as to the supreme sovereignty of the States—who repudiate equal rights by justifying local majorities in destroying them, as Mr. NICHOLAS did—who would justify the rebellion, and are willing to pay the rebel debt or repudiate our own, by way of brotherly kindness and conciliation, are the natural allies and alliance with those who elected ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON. Parties ultimately spring from real differences. Liberal and Tory are not the names of a policy merely, but of a principle, which controls policy.

We regard the appointment of Mr. KING, therefore, as a good omen of the continued harmony of the Union party, which is and must hereafter be the party of the country. The national prestige of the Democratic name is gone. The name of Democracy is indissolubly associated with treason, rebellion, and civil war. Under Democratic supremacy the country was overwhelmed in anarchy. Under a Democratic Administration it perished. By Democratic chiefs it was divided and exercised. By a Democratic Convention it was declared triumphant. By Democratic organs and orators as far as they dared, the theories from which the rebellion sprung are still justified. The Democratic party has forced its best men from its ranks. It has prostituted a noble name to the basest purposes. Among those that name may become again respectable, but for the present the American people have had quite enough of "the Democracy."

PUBLIC MORALS.

THE reaction from the tension of the war shows itself in a certain public frenzy. Enormous speculations, losses, and consequent frauds; an increase of wealth and luxury; tragical recklessness in the management of railroads and steamers; a fury of extravagance as public watering-places, are all observable in these first months of peace. There has been a more fearful and careless slaughter of travelers, more losses of money by frauds, more splendid and costly display, than ever before in the same period of time. The enormous issue of paper-money creating fictitious wealth; another lays it to the rapid and wonderful development of Petroleum; a third has a theory that we are probably deteriorates public morals; a fourth denies that the state of things is exceptional, but declares that the nation for centuries has been in the habit periodically now to be satisfied with startling sensations, and that therefore the events which were formerly passed by as notable are no more peculiar now paraded as especial enormities. The public must have its startling headings, its excitement points, its heavy type; and if there are no battles to report, then the fire, the railroad, their use, a murder, or a defalcation, or a riot must suffice for their employment.

The truth is, that all these theories are parts of the explanation. The public condition is not due to any one, but to all, of such secondary causes. A great civil commotion is always followed by a demoralized society. That it is not the currency only that is inflated, but every normal condition of society is somewhat distorted. Things have left their just relation. Military force has supplanted the slower, peaceful process of law, and men have become familiar with sudden and startling results. Huge fortunes rapidly amassed from lucky contracts; vast sales of property out of the ordinary course of society; the reaction from the excitement of the war; the sudden cessation of the tension and constant strain upon an absorbing interest—these influences the whole tone of society, and every bad effect in such phenomena as we behold.

But such phenomena are mainly local, and are most frequent at the great centres of population. In a strictly centralized country they may become, in their extent, very dangerous. But with us they will be corrected by the sturdy good sense of that vast rural population which includes the great bulk of American citizens, and which has a healthful and half-contemptuous mistrust of the city. The remedy for cities, as it is understood in history and in other countries, is quite unknown here. A revolution in Paris overturns France. A revolution in New York would be merely a nuisance to the neighbors.

It is dangerous, therefore, to generalize too broadly. A reaction from the peculiar excitement of the war was inevitable. It is showing itself in many ways; but they are transitory, while the steady progress of the people is plain. The war is itself the great proof of the moral force of the nation. That might have been justly doubted ten years or even five years ago. But it is indisputable now.

THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY.

THERE is a great deal said about the President's policy of reconstruction; and in some quarters there is a very liberal and ludicrous denunciation of those who oppose it. One paper especially, which was very anxious in the early spring of 1861 that the Montgomery Constitution should be accepted by the loyal citizens of the country, now lustily exhorts the President to strike out right and left and crush Jacobins and disorganizers, and all who withstand his policy. Who these terrible Jacobin fellows are, neither the virtuous patriot who calls for their destruction nor any body else knows. Neither do they know the President's policy. And that for the very simple reason that it is not, and has not, determined. It must, from the necessity of the case, depend upon circumstances.

The President has announced that in his opinion no State has seceded, but that every one which attempted secession is now to be reorganized. For that purpose he has named Provisional Governors, has authorized them to call Conventions, and has prescribed the conditions upon which those who were formerly voters in those States may vote. He has also stated certain changes which must be made in the State Constitutions, and has invited the Conventions to submit their work to Congress when it is done.

This is his policy as far as it can be at present known, either to himself or to any one else. Has he resisted a single measure of Congress? Certainly not; and that is the simple reason that if it is to be opposed it has not yet advanced to a point at which opposition is practicable. It is thus far preliminary, experimental.

Suppose, now, that the Convention of Mississippi cleanses the State Constitution of slavery, but provides that the colored freemen shall neither bear arms, nor testify in courts of justice, nor marry except under peculiar conditions—shall, in fact, while they cease to be chattel slaves, become a purely parish class—and having done this, the Convention should appoint an election at which notorious secessionists like HOWELL COBB or WADE HAMPTON, or their tools, should be elected to Congress—does the President's policy require the necessary assent of the United States to these performances?

If the elections in the late rebel States should result in the election of men who have supported and such representatives should be received by Congress, their effort would be, of course, to prevent their constituents being taxed to pay the expenses of the war for the Union;—in other words, to repudiate the national debt. Does the President's policy require that the national debt of the rebel States shall be paid?

These are questions that the most truculent rhodomontade about Jacobins and disorganizers does not answer. Yet it is only when these questions become practical that party divisions can take place. If, when they arise, the United States should be summoned to recognize such debts as fully and justly created, a powerful and formidable opposition would undoubtedly at once arise, taking the ground that a nation which was just suddenly saved and prolonged rebellion of a part of its citizens, is not bound by any written law or abstract theory of right or justice to admit those citizens to a share in its government, except upon conditions which seem to it compatible with the existence of the government.

There is nothing in the acts or words of the President to justify the insinuation that he wishes to intrust the political power of the late rebel States exclusively to the class to which for his whole life he has been bitterly opposed. If that be Jacobinism—make the most of it.

TREATMENT OF THE PATIENT.

A WRITER in the Evening Post, in reply to our quotation from its columns to the effect that the late war was not well-affected to the National Government, and our consequent conclusion that it would therefore be necessary for the country to protect itself by prescribing the terms of reorganization, says:

"We are republicans; we believe that men are capable of governing themselves; that, lurids of a direct and vivid sentiment of their government, they have a right to think as they please and act as they please; and that so long as they do not plot treason, they have nobody again to interfere with their freedom. They may be wrong in many of their opinions; they may be full of prejudices, conceits, absurdities, and nonsense; they may commit a thousand blunders and run smack in the face of their own best interests. Well, we deplore their folly and ignorance, but we leave them to themselves to learn better. We say, leave them alone, and they will do well enough. Let their own responsibilities; let them exercise their own limbs and minds. They will find out the connection between right and wrong from the results of their own experience; and this insane, unwholesome suspicion of danger will soon give place to the most vigorous health, to the most rational powers of understanding."

This the writer declares: to be the "optimism" upon which all our institutions are founded.

It is true. Upon the principle that men are capable of governing themselves our Government is entirely founded.

But how does this truth bear upon the question of reorganization? Does the writer mean that, as the towns have ceased from "a direct and violent resistance of the Government," the people of the United States are bound immediately to relax their hold upon the disaffected States until they shall again "pass the limits of order?" If he means this, will he permit us to remark, in a friendly spirit, that he indulges in "prejudice, conceit, absurdity, and nonsense?" If he does not mean this, will he allow us to say that he agrees with us that the whole people should continue their direct control of those States until they are convinced that the public safety is assured?

THE TRUTH OF THE NIAGARA PEACE MUDDLE.

THE publication in Mr. RAYMOND'S Life of LINCOLN of the President's correspondence with Mr. GREELEY at the time of the Niagara peace muddle of last year entirely clears any obscurity which rested upon Mr. LINCOLN'S action.

The facts are simply these: Mr. GREELEY heard that CLAY, SANDERS, and Co. were at Niagara, and were empowered to negotiate. He informed the President, and urged him to see the agents. The President replied that, if there were any persons authorized to speak for the rebel authorities for peace upon the basis of union and emancipation, they should have safe-conduct to and from Washington. Mr. GREELEY, whose heart had died within him at the unchristian spirit of what seemed to him the hopeless peril of the country, wrote to the agents that if they did wish to negotiate, he was authorized to say that the President would give them safe-conduct to Washington; but he did not mention the conditions absolutely imposed by Mr. LINCOLN. Of course, when the agents afterward discovered that there were conditions which had not previously been named, they accused the President of duplicity, and Mr. GREELEY did not defend them.

The difficulty arose from the fact that Mr. GREELEY concealed the conditions which the President demanded, and consequently put both parties at cross purposes.

His explanation does not change the facts. If he thought, as he undoubtedly did, that no precedent conditions should be insisted on, he should have tried to persuade the President to agree with him. If he could not do so, he should have refused to act as agent. Mr. GREELEY, by his own account, was very much of the mind of the Chicago Convention, that the war was a failure, and that we should beg for the best terms we could get. Indeed from the fatal moment in the early winter of 1860, when he said what was at once interpreted by the rebels to be the justification of the right of secession upon the principles of the revolution, down to his obsequious description of CLAY, THOMPSON, and SANDERS, as "distinguished American citizens," the only way to see the truth of Mr. GREELEY'S faith in the final triumph of the Union was apparently very flickering. Certainly a man who doubted and despaired and despaired was not a proper agent for a man like Mr. LINCOLN, whose tranquil faith never faltered.

It is pleasant to have the facts in this case clearly and conclusively stated as they now are. That the country would have been relieved and gratified if the whole correspondence had been published at the time is undeniable. Nobody had ever so little reason to fear the ridicule publicity for all he wrote and said as Mr. LINCOLN. And we have little doubt that he would have preferred the immediate publication of all the facts, except for his reluctance to pain and possibly depress the country by the disheartening view of the situation taken by one so well known and trusted as Mr. GREELEY.

ALL WRONG, DE SAUTY.

THE Atlantic cable is broken, and the great experiment pauses again for some years. That it will be finally relinquished is no more probable than that the attempt at submarine telegraphing would have been abandoned had all the earlier voyages failed. It must be tried under new auspices, doubtless, and with fresh hawsings. Either a new company will be formed and a new route selected is possible. Perhaps a line to the western islands will be adopted.

The catastrophe is doubtless final for the present. Yet the voyage is only a lesson in the art. The cable was not made, was ill-considered, and new methods of obviating them will follow. There were two interruptions before that of the 1st of August, and both were corrected. The mechanical difficulties will undoubtedly be surmounted, and they are the chief. The fact that an electric current can pass from a submarine village of men is prima facie evidence that it will not be disturbed by a distance of two thousand or more. The texture of the wire and the casing, the details of coiling and paying out and of shore connections, the calculation of strains and avoidance of friction, these are the practical practical questions—and these will be satisfactorily answered.

But poor De Sauty! We almost fear to hear that he has hanged himself with the elaborate cable. Or we can imagine him bending over the lofty stern of the Great Eastern gazing down forever into the ocean toward which his thinned and whitening hair hastens. When the signals ceased at Valentia, and only a succession of vague and confused shocks were detected, growing fainter and fainter until they wholly ceased, that very expiring indistinctness was the most emphatic message. The accomplished Fine Ear who presided at that end doubtless bent his assiduity over. Profound silence fell upon the appalled attendants. The hush of the midsummer noon grew ghostly around them. They watched their chief intently as he listened to the dying click; and as the final and all but imperceptible sound ceased, the phantom light in his eyes grew to be turned and whispered the last sigh of the Atlantic cable—"All wrong, De Sauty."

THE WALL STREET SCANDALS.

THE Wall Street storm is subsiding, and the wreckers are busy over the craft which went to pieces in the gale. A few small defalcations and frauds have been brought to light by the general and thorough examination of accounts which followed the failure of Jennings and Dodge, and developments; but there has been no revulsion, and the prophets of evil who likened the Ketchum explosion to the collapse of the Ohio Life and Trust Company in 1857, have thus far proved false augurs. So far as can be judged at present, the liabilities are no larger than another. Even Ketchum and Graham will pay substantial dividends to their creditors, and by singular good fortune, the losses caused by their failure will fall on people well able to bear them.

It is now important that the lesson taught by these frauds and disasters should not be thrown away. There are three cases before the courts, each of which should convey instruction to Wall Street.

In Andrews's case the lawyers seem to be devoting their wits to a wrangle over a "pretty, waiter girl," and her friend the butcher-boy—a insignificant brands of the case. By-and-bye it is to be hoped, they will let us know through whom, and through whose guilty knowledge or culpable indifference, this Andrews was enabled to lose $300,000 of the money of the Phenix Bank in stocks. This is the real "joint" of the matter. We may add a reminder about the way of litigation. Two days before the discovery of the great Schuyler frauds which convulsed Wall Street and ruined ever so many widows and orphans, Kyle, Schuyler's factotum, met a broker whom he knew.

"——," said he, cheerily, "how do you do? I haven't given you an order for some time. Let's see. Well, you may sell 500 Harlem for me for cash at the board."

The order was executed, the broker's check duly certified tendered to Mr. Kyle, and the certificate of stock received in exchange.

Here, apparently, the transaction ended. But it chanced that the broker was one of those wary, conscientious men who scented difficulties afar off. To be sure Mr. Kyle had as good a right to sell Harlem as any other man. But he had the power of creating stock by a mere stroke of his pen. And so, for fear of trouble, the broker thought he would let Mr. Schuyler know that his subordinate, Kyle, was selling Harlem. Mr. Schuyler had the best of reasons for saying that it was all right. Not satisfied, the broker determined the circumstance to two other directors in the Harlem. They were surprised, and promised an investigation; the consequence of which was that Kyle's operations ran away, and his frauds were brought to light. Had this broker been less wary and less suspicious they might have gone on much longer, and ruined many more people.

The Mumford case is a repetition of the famous case of Tompkins. Patrick H. Mumford, a gold broker, bought gold, and gave in payment checks which were not good when he gave them, and have not since been good. In Ray Tompkins's case, the court held that Tompkins had not been guilty of crime though he received stocks, paid for them with worthless checks, and refused afterward to return either the money or the stocks. The principle evolved was that a broker who receives a check in payment for property takes the risk of the check proving worthless. If the check proves bad, he has his claim against the maker. But the latter is not liable if he committed an offense against society, and can not be punished as a swindler. In Mumford's case, it is alleged that he sold the gold he had paid for with his worthless checks, deposited the money in the Tradesmen's Bank, where he had kept a trifling account, and afterward drew it out and absconded. If these facts could only be proved, and the courts should hold that they do not constitute crime, or misdemeanor, it will follow that no man in Wall Street will hereafter deliver property of any kind except for a certified check. Business may be hindered by the general adoption of this rule, but it will be rendered safer.

Ketchum's case was thoroughly described in our last number. But few additional facts have come to light, though many theories are current. One paper, which has often abused dealers in gold as traitors, insists that Ketchum went to prices in buying to "bull" gold; whereas, the fact is, he had latterly but little interest in the gold market, and only dealt in gold for the purpose of accounting for his being possessed of such quantities of gold checks. His arena was the stock market. Another paper solicits sympathy for Ketchum on the ground of his alleged loyalty. The fact is, the house was a bitter opponent of Mr. Chase, no friend to Mr. M'Culloch, and a firm foe to investments in United States securities. Still another paper lays the blame of Ketchum's forgeries on the Legal Tender Act. It might just as fairly be laid on the discovery of America. True, if there had been no Legal Tender Act Ketchum's forged gold checks would not have been good collateral. But if America had never been discovered there would have been also no Ketchum to cheat, and no Wall Street to be cheated. Why not abuse Columbus as well as Mr. Chase? A villain or two remains, no double-dyed, so ingenious as Edward B. Ketchum would have robbed people any where, and under any circumstances.

Two hours before he died a broker visited him with the weekly bank statement. He examined it with his usual languid interest, and discussed its effect on the money market coolly. To a confidential suggestion with regard to his policy in the market he replied, with a lie that was familiar to his lips, that his interest was trifling.

He was marvelous as a deceiver. A gentleman who traveled with him observed to a friend that he seemed to have none of the faults of a young man. He never drank, his language was always decorous, he did not gamble, and among women he was a Joseph. Yet it seems now that, with a wife only lately married to him, he kept a mistress in style not far from his own house. His delight for his father seemed exemplary; yet he did not scruple to plunge that father—who had labored forty years to accumulate a fortune—into the depths of poverty and disgrace.

Some of his idiosyncrasies seem inexplicable. He not only kept accounts with a dozen or more brokers—some of them under feigned names—but actually kept as many as twenty different accounts with one house. These accounts were generally distinguished by letters, A B C, D E F, G H I, J K L, and various combinations of letters. Edward B. Ketchum furnished the margins for all these cabalistic operators, and issued checks against their vouchers by the variety and seeming contrariety of his orders. What his object was, unless to gratify his inordinate appetite for mysterious combinations, it were hard to say. It was no joke to be his broker. To one house he would send a slip of paper at 10 A.M. saying simply, "I have sold you Gold—Ketchum." Another, "Buy me to-day." Or again: "Borrow 10,000 Erie for me before 2 P.M." But his business was so profitable to his agents that they did not object to working hard for him.

He is said to have robbed the firm of which he was a member of the bulk of their securities. They were so sound a house, so universally trusted, that many persons, especially in New England, used to leave their stocks and bonds in their custody for safe or for sale-keeping. A large proportion of these stocks and bonds young Ketchum is said to have abstracted. A question will arise, in connection with the branch of the subject touching the responsibility and the duties of copartners. There were four partners in the house of Ketchum, Son, & Co. Were each of Edward B. Ketchum's partners these securities without their knowledge? There is in law a degree of neglect, known as culpa supinissima, which differs but infinitesimally from felonious intent.

The house has published a card disclaiming complicity in Edward B. Ketchum's operations. This has been generally received with derision. People can not comprehend how so shrewd a man as Morris Ketchum can have been "completely hoodwinked by Edward B. Ketchum party"—as his son was called—when all the Wall Street operators and all the newspapers talked of nothing else. If the street gains nothing else by Ketchum versus Ketchum, it ought to derive the lesson that in every banking firm each partner must assume his share of responsibility for the dealings of the firm as a whole, and of his copartners individually.

A question has arisen as to the disposal of the securities deposited with the defaulting firm. Ketchum seems to have made away. In gold and stocks, in 1863 and 1864, he must have made over a million. He seems to have obtained over a million and a half by the issue of forged gold checks. And from his father's house he is said to have purloined some two hundred thousand more. Only a few days' youth of twenty-five must have had a capital of $4,500,000 to trade upon. What has become of it? How much he lost on his short sales of stocks in January, February, and March of this year no one can tell. In last number we set down the gains of his opponents in Erie at a million. Further inquiry leads us to estimate them at more than that figure. In other stocks he lost proportionate sums. There is reason to believe that he had purchased of Scatogo, and not a few of the blood-horses which have run there this summer, were really paid for by Edward B. Ketchum, whose losses to their owners furnished the means for these flights of extravagance. It is supposed in some quarters that he went away with less than $50,000 of money. It will probably be found, if he is caught and tells the truth, that he had $70,000 when he ran away—neither more nor less.

To tell the truth, there is not much sympathy felt for his victims. Some of them were careless, others imprudent. What can be said of a broker who, knowing Edward B. Ketchum's means and his position as a junior partner in a house trusted by all men, speculated for him to the extent of ten and twenty million dollars? And that money-lenders who advanced money on his forged gold checks—receiving them in a bundle in a sealed envelope, and never examining them to any scrutiny—is any body surprised or much grieved at their losses? Que diable allaient-ils faire dans cette galère?

PLEASING POLITICAL REMINISCENCES.

Mr. S. S. Cox, a former member of Congress from Ohio, and an ardent supporter of Vallandigham when the latter was Ohio gave a hundred thousand majority against him, was defeated at the last Congressional election, and has left the State of Ohio to reside in the City of New York. Mr. Cox has in press, as we learn from some extracts published in the New York rebel organ, a volume of political reminiscences. The book is one reminiscence which we suppose will hardly be included in the work, and we subjoin it as an interesting supplement. Mr. Cox was one of the managers from the Chicago peace and surrender Convention a year ago, and in the course of a speech in that city remarked, as reported at the time:

> "For less offenses than Mr. Lincoln had been guilty of the English people had chopped off the head of the first Charles. In his private character and duties ought to be brought to the same block together. The other day they arrested a man in Washington for uttering treason. Treason, for saying, in private conversation, that Lincoln was no better than Jeff Davis. He was ready to say the same here or anywhere. Let the minister of the Administration object, if they dare."

Mr. James Buchanan, also, has a history of his political life, of his Administration, in press. He will of course quote the confidential letter of Howell Cobb, in which that worthy gentleman advised President Buchanan to appoint Secretary of the Treasury, and in that capacity did what he could to ruin the credit of the United States. But I repeat to you, that the Administration of Mr. Buchanan is the most thoroughly identified with our principles and our rights of any that has ever preceded it, and I am willing to stand or fall upon the issue. When Sherman came through Georgia this Cobb, a consummate "Southern gentleman," drove away all his negroes, handed slaves, leaving the old and helpless to starve to death.

Mr. Buchanan, also, will naturally quote the utterance from his last message, when he knew that a conspiracy was organized to destroy the Government and ruin the country, and that the chief conspirators were his own confidential advisers. It was then he said that if the Personal Liberty bills—bills to prevent Howell Cobb and Company from kidnapping the citizens of Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and other States—were not repealed, "the injured States, after having first used all peaceful and constitutional means to obtain redress, would be justified in revolutionary resistance to the Government of the Union." This is well called, in a little pamphlet which has fallen under our observation, a "Buchanan defense to rebellion."

Why does James Buchanan refuse the charity of contemptuous forgetfulness into which he has fallen? Why should he strive to revive the national consciousness of his imbecility?

THE VOICE OF "THE SOUTH."

We have seen a letter, too long for publication, from an octogenarian who was born before the Constitution was adopted, upon whose head Washington laid his hand, and who is a South Carolina Unionist. The letter is a curious and most involuntary indictment of that policy in our country which hesitated to grapple boldly with the idea of the unity of State sovereignty. It shows that profound and unalterable conviction which welded the sentiment of the Southern slave States into a unit, and enabled them with such tenacity and sacrifice to prolong the war.

The writer dates from "Where Columbia was." Every line reveals a mind stored with the traditions of a section, and confused with the hair-splitting sophistries of Calhoun. "I was born and reared a worthy of citizenship," says the writer, "because I have followed in the footsteps of my ancestors, and served South Carolina and the United States." He does not believe that the Constitution created "a vast, consolidated, and irresponsible empire;" yet he believes South Carolina to be a little empire of that kind. He holds the right of revolution to be consecrated in every line of the Constitution, yet declares that "nullification, secession, or anything like it, has been sovereignly condemned, were but this right of revolution "in disguise." He has opposed such measures for more than forty years, yet believes that right could not be denied without destroying the instrument. It is "consolidation that I, a Union man, most fear." He has always been a slaveholder, looking for "the termination of slavery," and believed, from "the good sense and good feeling of the Southern people," it was gradually disappearing. The President's proclamation of emancipation was "the most sinful act ever committed." The slave was lately "an orderly member of society." He is now becoming a robber and a murderer. "Does a servile massacre of the whites in South Carolina necessarily reconstruct the Union?" Without a high respect for the writer this letter might be meant to reconstruct the Union; he is sure Lee did. "I am sure it was uppermost in the heart of Mr. Lincoln." The letter concludes by asking, "Can the North believe that we are traitors per se? that we (those who favored secession, which I did not) have no idea of a constitutional right peaceably to withdraw? If such is their conviction we must remain their prisoners, but can never hope to be their countrymen. We have fought them upon a principle. We have done our best, and our best has not been sufficient. Can the victors neither forgive nor relent? We are thoroughly humbled. Is there a necessary we should be as thoroughly degraded?" He explains that he says "we," not because he doubted the wisdom of the Union, but because no honorable man will abandon his kindred; "and the miserable cowards who are doing so in Charleston will be the first to lose the confidence which they never deserved."

Such a letter is a perfect transcript of the pitiable mental condition of honest rebels. Such men are not to be insulted. Their conduct in the right of "peaceable secession" is as steadfast as our faith in the supreme national authority. The war was not the inevitable result between these convictions. But those who are defeated are not persuaded. They can not, therefore, honorably ask to be allowed to administer a government of which they frankly own that they are not faithful. The exquisite folly of asking whether we have no idea of a government which provides for its own self-destruction can not be perceived by a mind which thinks the same provision is the right of revolution. Indeed the letter is as pitiful and painful as it is absurd, yet it speaks for those who have so long controlled "the South" and the country.

MONUMENT TO GEN. M'PHERSON.

The Army of the Tennessee propose to erect a suitable monument over the grave of their former commander, Major-General James B. M'Pherson, one of the most accomplished soldiers and truest heroes of the war. Under the Presidency of Major-General John A. Logan a Committee of Correspondence has been appointed, consisting of Major-General W. B. Hazen, Cleveland, Ohio; Brevet Major-General M. D. Leggett, Zanesville, Ohio; Brevet Brigadier-General A. Hickenlooper, Cincinnati. Those who have fought beside him will know how to honor worthily him who knew most nobly.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SOUTH.

A most important speech was made by General Schenck in the 10th of July, at Chillicothe, Ohio. The spirit of the rebellion, according to General Schenck, has not been extinguished. The idea, he says, that one or more States of the Union has the right to break up the whole Government and destroy the blessings upon all who are or have just passed through, still prevails. The President might have held the rebellion to be a matter in dispute only as a conquered people until satisfied of their entire loyalty, and until retaining for the future guarantees of perfect acquiescence; or he might have withdrawn the military force altogether, and left those who control the States therein locally and in their relations to the other States. From the former he found objections to each of these courses, and the President combined them, holding a military force over them at the same time that he was willing to reinstate these civil powers, and begin again the exercise of their loyal functions. This latter policy, however, was only an experiment, and the speaker assured his hearers that the President was willing to-day, or any two days ago, in a full and free interview with him, the President said he would withdraw the last guard—not up in the rebellious States as temporary experiments, simply to give the people an opportunity to show whether they will develop the right spirit and policy necessary for a full restoration to their rights and position in the Government. While regarding their as experiments, he intends that the military power of the Government shall be kept fully up to the line, so that if they be found straying back into rebellious ways the military will be there to prevent them from again making the trouble they have heretofore caused.

The President, in this connection, referred to the course that had just been pursued in reference to the Richmond Fair, and to the extreme manifestation of that rebellious spirit by electing to office the very men who had led the rebellion, and against their protest, and in the face with his assertion that the military authorities had set aside the State election, he gave this as an example of what might be expected in other cases of a similar kind.

NEWS ITEMS.

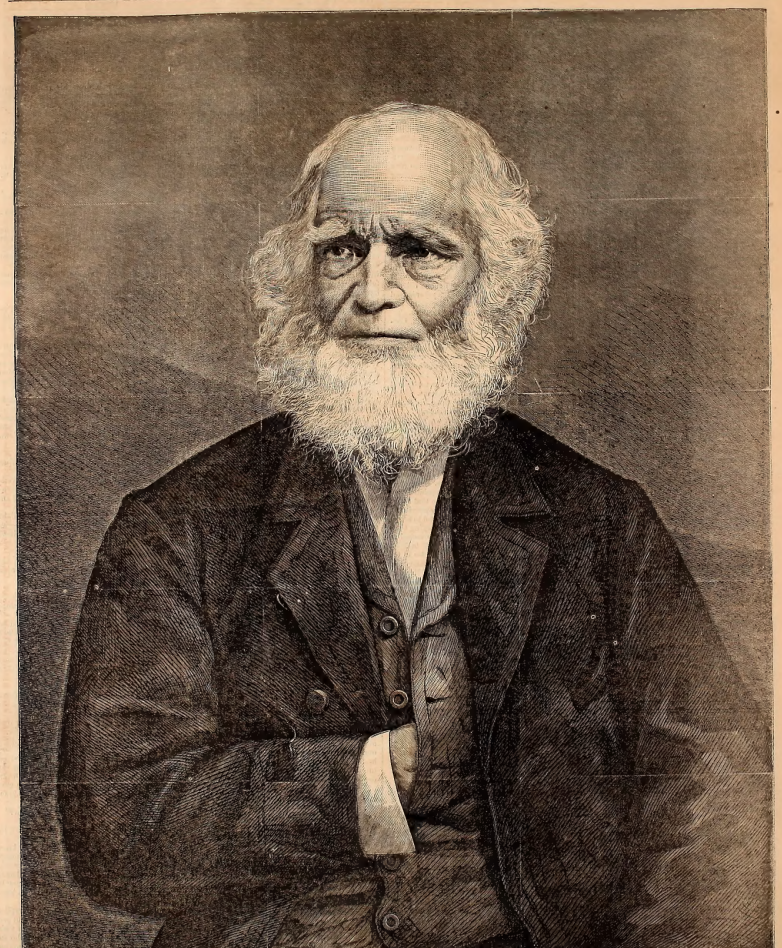
The Maine Democratic State Convention met in Portland August 16. There were present five hundred and seventy-four delegates. Mr. E. F. Pillsbury, the temperance reformer, was nominated for Governor by acclamation on the platform of State Sovereignty, which the Democrats have always contended for. The resolutions adopted were greatly pure and patriotic. The resolutions adopted were in consistency with the spirit of these remarks. Hon. James Howard, of Portland, was unanimously nominated for Attorney-General.

Hon. Alexander H. Stephens and Gordon Granger are at Mobile, Alabama.

Major-General Mower succeeds General Granger in command at Galveston, Texas.

Judge A. R. Lochrane, of Macon, Georgia, died in that city recently.

A Sunday said to be the only one now in Texas, has been lately opened at Galveston.



Nothing further has been heard from Edward Ketchum, the defaulter.

The three-sixth anniversary of the birth of Napoleon the Great occurred on the 15th of August.

Gen. Cobb has been appointed Naval Officer of this port, relieving Mr. Dennison.

WALL STREET AND BROADWAY—WAYS OF GETTING AND SPENDING MONEY.

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

"A poem having been intimated in the Monthly Anthology of June last whether a youth of thirteen years could have been the author of this poem—in justice to the merits the friends of the writer feel obliged to certify the fact, from their personal knowledge of himself and his family, as well as his literary improvement and extraordinary talents. . . . They therefore assure the public that Mr. BRYANT, the author, is a native of Cummington, in the county of Hampshire, Massachusetts, and by the month of November last arrived at the age of fourteen years. The facts so authenticated by many of the inhabitants of that place."

These are the words of an "advertisement," dated February, 1809, and prefixed to a slight, old-fashioned pamphlet, of thirty-six pages, containing "The Embargo, or, Sketches of the Times.—A Satire. The Second Edition, Corrected and Enlarged. Together with the Spanish Revolution, and other Poems." The other poems are but six in number, and one of them is a translation from Horace. None have been reproduced in the later collections of Mr. BRYANT's works. Five years afterward, in his nineteenth year, he wrote "Thanatopsis," the best known and the most celebrated of American poems.

From that time to this Mr. BRYANT's name has been one of the most conspicuous and most honored among American authors and citizens. His robust and manly genius has not only created our literature with the peculiar inspiration of the American landscape, but, in his constant fidelity to political duty, he has elevated the ideal of American life. Shy and reserved in temperament, and with the austere tastes of an earnest scholar, he has yet declined to live secluded in his library, and, with a kind of woodland independence and coolness, has moved in the thickest throng of men and the hottest conflicts of opinion.

It is this mingled austerity and independence which gives the characteristic tone to his poetry as to his life. The stock criticism of Mr. BRYANT is that he is cold. His genius is described as a clear, full of exquisite hues and of a towering majesty, but not to the core. Yet, when the critic has said or written the word, if he would but look through the three small volumes that contain the poems of Mr. BRYANT'S sixty years of authorship, he will be amazed at the fond tones and pathos of deep tone—a tenderness like that of the Juan landscape, and a pathos like the sighing of winds among the pines.

The spirit of his works and of his life is in a static harmonium. They are both marked by the healthiness, freshness, and sober cheerfulness of American nature. His poetry is not only faithfully pictorial of our scenery, but it is full of its inward character. The solemn, shadowy, warm-scented forest aisles; "the hills rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun;" "the new leaved trees;" the "amber air;" the yellow violet and the fringed gentian; the singing birds and the humming bees; the cliff and the mountain peak, with their sharp, sparkling line above—all breathe in and forever fix the simple melody of his verse. Familiar with the nomenclature and literature of all known tongues in tropical languor, no fire in passion, but he always preserves the native temperature and . . . to read him is to walk meditating in a pine wood of New England, not of Old England, nor in the hot wine-shrub of Sherwood and Ardenne, nor in the voluptuous gold of Homer or German Black Forest. But as AMERICAN as CHAUCER is English or BOCCACCIO Italian.

Essentially a contemplative poet, he yet never preaches or proses, and is never prolix, like the good bard of Eydal; and his "Song of Marion's Men" has the true lyrical ring. Free from conceit and rhetoric, the thought never glimmers—seeming vast because it is vague—but its native grandeur ennobles his verse with perfect simplicity. There is a calm, clear, daylight effect in all he writes. The broad sympathy, the lofty tone, are like an elixir of mountain air.

In his conduct of the Evening Post—in which he has been faithfully supported by WILLIAM LEGGETT, JOHN BIGELOW, CHARLES NORDHOFF, and for many years by the accomplished DENNIS KEARNEY—Mr. BRYANT'S characteristics are as apparent as in his poetry. The Post has always advocated the most practicable freedom in social politics, in religion, in commercial and productive industry. It opposes class legislation; and enforces, with trenchant eloquence and often with rich and scholarly satire, that popular self-reliance without which any government may, in corrupt hands, endanger the most vital national interests. Yet, amidst the fierce party conflicts of forty years, the editor's character, assaulted often by innuendo and implication, has remained as spotless as that of the youth of thirteen years who wrote the Embargo among the Hampshire hills. During all that time the editor has incessantly defended and explained the principles that are truly American, as the poet has sung the characteristic charm of the scenery of his native land.

That the heart of the poet has often enough yearned for escape from the unclean turmoil of political life is constantly shown in his songs. But the overpowering Puritan conscience would not suffer Milton to steal away from the battle for moral and political liberty, has held BRYANT firmly to the same duty. In the golden evening-time of a life which, while working with and for others, has always preserved its serene independence, Mr. BRYANT may say with his sixty-seventh birthday a prayer to which every true American heart will say Amen!

"Gentians are the weeds, in that latest gold and crimson,
Yet on full-leaved willows are in their freshest green.
Such a kindly autumn, so mercifully dealing
With the sad years of summer, I never yet have seen.

"Like this kindly season may life's decline come o'er me;
Past is manhood's sombre, the frosty months are near;
Yet be genial airs and a pleasant sunshine left me,
Load and fruit and blossom, to bind the sheaf and cheer.

"Dreary are the years when the eye can look no longer
With delight on nature or hope on human kind;
Oh may those that whiten my temples, as they pass me,
Leave the heart unbroken, and spare the cheerful mind!"

NEW YORK EMIGRANT DEPÔT.

CASTLE GARDEN, at the Battery, was formerly a theatre. It was leased by the Commissioners of Emigration in 1855 and converted into an emigrant depôt. Up to that time the newly-arrived emigrants were victimized without mercy by thieves and scoundrels. The Garden has remedied the old evil, and has for years afforded a shelter of security to emigrants. The benefits of the depôt are numerous, both to emigrants and to the other parties concerned. Besides having a place provided for the landing of his effects the emigrant is also relieved from the extortion of runners and the harbors of bogus railway tickets. There is an office connected with the depôt where tickets may be bought at the lowest rates directly from the various transporting companies. If the emigrant desires to stay in the city his baggage is transported for him to the desired locality. The depôt also affords facilities for relieving the emigrant ship immediately of its passengers, which is a great convenience to shipping.

MR. BERNARD CASSERLY is the chief agent and superintendent of the depôt, and is assisted by an efficient staff of clerks. Among the subdepartments of the establishment is an inquiry department, where parties call for friends who have arrived, and where they have to satisfy the officer in charge that they are not impostors. The sick, to the number of about ten every day, are sent to Ward's Island. There is an intelligence-office at the garden, where citizens may procure male or female help. There is also a letter-writing department, where the emigrants can write to their friends or have letters written for them.

Since 1855 about three millions of emigrants have arrived at this port. Last year the number of these was 185,915, being an increase of 30,000 over the previous year. The largest number on record is 319,223—the number of arrivals in 1854. If we take the number of emigrants arriving at this port in 1864 we shall find that 90,000 were from Ireland, nearly 60,000 from Germany, and about 24,000 from England. These three countries are the chief sources of emigration. The prospect is that the new impulse which will now be given to every department of labor in the country will draw from Europe a larger tide of emigration than for previous years.

ACCIDENT IN THE ITALIAN ALPS.

DURING the month of July several English gentlemen, members of an Alpine Club, came to Zermatt, with the intention of climbing the colossal cliffs of Mount Cervin, hitherto pronounced inaccessible. These were EDWARD WHYMPER, CHARLES HUDSON, MR. HADDO, and Lord FRANCIS DOUGLAS. MR. HUDSON had brought with him cables of new wire to facilitate the ascent, but left them behind at his hotel. He and his companions procured three guides from Zermatt, and with seven bottles of wine began the ascent. Having passed through the snow at the foot of Cervin, Lord FRANCIS DOUGLAS, who was only nineteen years old, took some rest, during, while the others slept. They awoke. This was on the night of July 13–14. On the morning they resumed their ascent, and found the ascent more easy than they had expected. By two o'clock P.M. they reached the summit; and after a short rest they began to retrace their course. CROZ, one of the guides, went ahead; after him came DOUGLAS, HADDO, HUDSON, and WHYMPER; then came the other two guides, LUCHER and his son. All of them were attached to a single cord, and were proceeding down the jagged way, with great excitation over their success, when DOUGLAS slipped and gave the cord a violent pull that tumbled HADDO, HUDSON, and the whole company over the cliff. CROZ, DOUGLAS, the father, who was last in the line, did not lose his presence of mind. He passed his end of the cord through a crack in the rock, and believed for a moment that he had arrested the fall of his fellow-travelers, but suddenly the rope broke between WHYMPER and HUDSON; and CROZ, Lord DOUGLAS, HADDO, and HUDSON bounded down from rock to rock for thousands of feet. The next morning their bodies were found where they fell.

REAR-ADMIRAL F. H. GREGORY.

AMONG the naval heroes who have come down to us from a comparatively recent date, REAR-ADMIRAL FRANCIS H. GREGORY must be recognized as one of the foremost. When this war was begun Admiral GREGORY was commanding the Boston Navy-Yard. Notwithstanding his age, he was eager to be sent to sea. Secretary WELLES, however, deeming that he would be of more service on shore, ordered him to take charge of one of our navy-yards, and subsequently appointed him general superintendent of the depôts, a position which he still retains.

Admiral GREGORY was born at Norwalk, Connecticut, October 9, 1787, and was therefore seventy-seven in March, 1802, and after having escaped from British imprisonment, was warranted as a Midshipman in the navy of the United States on January 16, 1809. His first service was on board the schooner Revenge, commanded by Lieutenant D. H. PORTER. In March, 1810, he was transferred to the Vesuvius, and went to New Orleans. Here he signalized himself by two or three heroic exploits directed against pirates and smugglers.

The next year Admiral GREGORY was ordered to a Northern station; and at the commencement of the War of 1812 was transferred to Commodore CHAUNCEY'S command on Lake Ontario. He was engaged in the attack on Sackett's Harbor in that year, and the next March was appointed Flag-Lieutenant. He was at the capture of Fort George, and in all the actions on Lake Ontario.

In 1821 Lieutenant GREGORY was appointed commander of the Grampus, and cruised in that vessel throughout the West Indies in the suppression of piracy. Four years later he was selected to fit out the Brandywine for the purpose of conveying General LAFAYETTE to France. He was attached to the Navy-yard at New York from 1828 to 1831, when he was sent in the Falmouth to cruise in the Pacific; in 1838 was promoted to Captain; in 1845 was employed in the blockade of Mexican ports; in 1854 was placed in command of the Navy-yard at Boston.

Admiral GREGORY has rendered the country inestimable service during the late war. We are indebted to him for the introduction of torpedoes into our navy. He superintended the construction of the machinery invented by Chief-Engineer WOOD for the destruction of the Albemarle; and Mr. WOOD asserts that but for the kind appreciation of the Admiral his inventions might not have been tested until too late to be of practical service. Admiral GREGORY is a man of spotless integrity, and has always been beloved by the men under his command.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

MR. KECKWITCH PROVES HIMSELF TO BE A MAN OF ORIGINAL GENIUS.

A THRILL of virtuous satisfaction pervaded Mr. Keckwitch's respectable bosom at this discovery. He had gained the day, after all, and gained it easily. The rest would be more difficult; but it was sure to follow. Besides, he was not the man to be daunted by such obstacles as were likely to present themselves in an undertaking of this kind. They were obstacles of detail, not principle. Which being acknowledged, cautious temperament was best fitted to deal with; and he knew his. Perhaps, on the whole, he rather liked what there would be some difficulties in the way that might have the satisfaction of overcoming them. At all events they gave an additional zest to the pursuit that he had in hand; and though his habitual caution was stimulated by success, like most phlegmatic men, was not displeased to be stimulated.

Sufficient, however, for the day was the triumph thereof. Here was the gate of Elton House; and only to have penetrated so far into William Trefalden's confidence was to achieve ment of no slight importance. But the head of the house was constantly only to see the gate. He would not have a glimpse of the house as well; and so walked on to the bottom of the square, crossed over, and looked back from the other side. The lane, however, was narrow, and the walls were high; so that, take it from what point he would, the house remained invisible. He could see the tops of two or three somberlooking trees, and a faint column of smoke mounting away as it rose against the back-ground of blue sky; but that was all, and he was none the wiser for the sight. So, knowing that he risked observation every moment he lingered in Slade's Lane, he turned quickly back again, pulled out the bell-handle, and, when a door and through a little turnstile leading to a footway shut in by thick green hedges on either side.

He could not tell in the least where this path would lead him; but seeing a net-work of similar walks intersecting the inclosures in various directions, he hoped to double back somehow or another into the main road. In the mean while he hurried on till a bend in the path carried him well out of sight of the entrance to Slade's Lane, and there paused to rest in the shade of an appleorchard.

It was now about half past six o'clock. The sun was still shining; the evening was still warm; the apple-blossoms filled the air with a delicious perfume. All around and before him, occupying the whole space of ground between Kensington and Brompton, lay nothing but meadows, and fruit-gardens, and orchards heavy with blossom white and pink. A pleasant, peaceful scene, not without some kind of vernal beauty for appreciative eyes!

But Mr. Keckwitch's dull orbs, however, were appreciative they might be at other times, were blind just now to every impression of beauty. Waiting there in the shade he wiped the perspiration from his forehead, recovered his breath as he best could, and thought only of how he might turn his journey to some farther account before getting back to town. It was much to have discovered Elton House: but he had yet to learn what manner of life it was led in it by William Trefalden. It would have been something only to have caught a glimpse through an open gate—to have seen where the house was large or small, cheerful or dismal. He had expected to find it dull and dilapidated, with half the windows shuttered up, and the rest all black with the smoke of many years; and he did not feel inclined to go away in as much ignorance of these points as when he left Nunscery Lane. Possibly an idea occurred to him—a very bright, ingenious idea, which gave him so much satisfaction that he rubbed it in a little inadvertently, and started forward again quite briskly to find his way out of this labyrinth of hedgerows and cabbage gardens.

He had not gone many yards before he came to a cross-road with green paths branching off in every direction. Here, however, like a large blue spider in the midst of his web, stood a portly policeman, from whom Mr. Keckwitch at once learned his nearest way to Palace Gardens, and followed it. He asked for Palace Gardens this time, being anxious to emerge upon the High Street without again traversing Slade's Lane in broad daylight.

Having done so at this point, Mr. Keckwitch went into the first stationer's shop that he could see, and bought a ledger. The stationer had some difficulty in supplying him, for the ledger he required was of a somewhat unusual shape and size. "Large foolscap," he said, "ruled, ruled, and bound in red leather." He would not have it ruled off in columns for accounts, and the stationer to none that were not ruled in that manner. At last he found one that was quite plain—a mere oblong book of flash-post paper bound in red cloth, with sealed leather back and corners; and with this, although it was not exactly what he wanted, Mr. Trefalden's head clerk was forced to content himself. He also bought a parallel ruler, a small bottle of ink, and a couple of quill pens, saying that he preferred to write with them.

It was now striking seven by Kensington church clock; and Mr. Keckwitch, who was not used to going without his tea, inquired his way to the nearest coffee-house, which proved to be in Church Street, Soho. It was a modest little place enough; but he made himself very comfortable there, establishing himself at a table at the farther end of the room, calling for lights and a substantial tea, and setting to work at once upon the ruling of his ledger. When he had done ruling the pages he divided each into three parts by a couple of vertical lines, and desired the waiter to bring him the London Post. Other literature he did not look for, and not for Elton House. He had searched for that some days back and found no mention of it. He simply opened it at KENSINGTON HIGH STREET, page four hundred and forty-nine, and proceeded patiently and methodically to copy out its contents under the several titles of Name, Address, and Occupation. By the time that he had thus finished one page or five pages, and and finished his tea, it was half past eight o'clock, and quite dark.

That is to say, it was quite dark in the sky overhead, but quite brilliant in Kensington High Street. That picturesque thoroughfares was lighted with gas, and the shops blazed with gas; the pavements were crowded; there was a brass band playing at the Horse Guards at one corner, and the very fruit and oyster-stalls in front of the church were bright with lanterns. The place, in short, was as light as at noonday; and Mr. Keckwitch, who wished to avoid observation, was naturally somewhat disturbed and a good deal disappointed. He had, however, made up his mind to do a certain thing, and he was determined to go through with it; so he pulled his hat a little more over his eyes, put his ink-bottle and pens in the breast-pocket of his coat, tucked his ledger under his arm, and went out into the street in the direction of Slade's Lane.

He had observed a baker's shop within a few paces of the corner, where the omnibus had set him down, and this shop was his present destination. He went in with the assured step of a man who is about his regular work, touched his hat to a pleasant-looking woman behind the counter, and said—

"I am going round, ma'am, for the new Directory. There's been no change here, I suppose, since last year."

No. 39 had undergone whatever," she replied.

Mr. Keckwitch opened his ledger on the counter, pulled out one of his quill pens, and drew his fat forefinger down a certain column of names.

"Wilson, Emma, baker and confectioner," said he, reading one of the entries. "Is that quite right, ma'am?"

"Fancy bread and biscuit baker, if you please, Sir," replied Mrs. Wilson, "not confectioner."

"Thank you, ma'am. Fancy bread and biscuit baker."

And Mr. Keckwitch drew his pen through "confectioner" and substituted Mrs. Wilson's emendation with a business-like gravity that did him credit.

"I thought the Post-Office Directory for this year was out already, Sir," observed Mrs. Wilson, as he blotted off the entry and closed his ledger.

"This is not the Post-office Directory, ma'am," said Mr. Keckwitch, calmly. "This is a new Directory of the Western and Southwestern districts."

"Oh, indeed! a sort of new Court Guide, I suppose?"

"Just so, ma'am. A sort of new Court Guide. Wish you good-evening."

"Good-evening, Sir," replied Mrs. Wilson, as he again raised his finger half-way to the brim of his hat, and left the shop; he had scarcely passed the threshold, however, when he paused and turned back.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am, for troubling you again," he said, "but perhaps you can tell me who lives at Elton House?"

"Elton House?"

"Yes; Elton House in Slade's Lane. I've been knocking and ringing there till I'm tired, and can get no one to open to the gate. Is it uninhabited?"

Mr. Keckwitch said this so naturally, and with such an air of ill-used respectability, that detective Kidd himself would scarcely have doubted the truth of his statement. As for Mrs. Wilson, she accepted every word of it in perfect good faith.

"Oh no," she replied, "it is not uninhabited. The name is Duvernay."

"Duvernay," repeated Mr. Trefalden's head clerk, incorporating the bridge and dipping his pen in Mrs. Wilson's ink. "With your leave, ma'am. A foreign family, I suppose?"

"I think so—a French."

"And Mr. Duvernay—can you tell me what profession to enter?"

"There is no Mr. Duvernay," said Mrs. Wilson, with an odd little cough and a slight elevation of the eyebrows. "At least, not that I am aware of."

Mr. Keckwitch looked up with that dull light in his eyes which only came in the rarest circumstances of strong excitement. Mrs. Wilson looked down and coughed again.

"Is the lady a widow?" he asked. bluntly.

"I believe she calls herself a widow," replied Mrs. Wilson; "but indeed, Sir, I can't say what she is."

"And there's no gentleman?"

"I didn't say that, Sir."

"I beg your pardon, I thought I understood so."

"I said there was no Mr. Duvernay; and no more there is. But I don't desire to speak ill of my neighbors, and Madame's a customer."

Mr. Keckwitch shook his head solemnly.

"Dear, dear!" said he. "Very sad, very sad indeed. A wicked world, ma'am! So little real respectability in it."

"Very true, Sir."

"Then I suppose I must simply put down Madame Duvernay, three, adding no name to the house?"

"I suppose so, Sir. There is no master that I know of; at least, no acknowledged master."

"Still, if there is a gentleman, and he lives in the house, as I think you implied just now—"

"Oh, dear, I imply nothing," said the mistress of the shop, somewhat impatiently, as if she had been worried on the subject. "Madame Duvernay's doings are nothing to me; and the gentleman may be her husband for aught I know to the contrary."

"You can not give me his name, ma'am?"

"No, Sir."

"I am sorry for that. I ought to have his name if he really lives in the house."

"I can not give it to you because I don't know it," said Mrs. Wilson, rather more graciously. "I can not even take it upon myself to say that he lives at Elton House. I have seen no woman there, I believe, very constantly; but he may be a visitor. I really can't tell; and it's no business of mine."

"Nor of mine, if he is only a visitor," replied Mr. Keckwitch, again closing his ledger and preparing to be off. "I have no desire to annoy visitors, but we're bound to take note of regular inhabitants. I'm very much obliged to you, ma'am —very much indeed, I'm sure."

"I'm sure, Sir, you're very welcome."

"Thank you. And a little help goes a long way in matters of this kind; and it isn't pleasant to stand at a gate knocking and ringing for half an hour together."

"No, indeed; far from it, Sir. I can't think what all the servants were about to let you do so."

"Good-evenin' once more, ma'am."

"Good-evening, Sir."

And Mr. Keckwitch walked out of the shop this time without turning back again.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

DISPATCHES FROM ITALY.

"I LOVE this terrace," said Miss Colonna, "it is so like the terrace of an Italian house."

"I am very glad, for that reason, when the summer is sufficiently advanced to let us put out the orange-trees," replied Lord Castletowers.

It was shortly after breakfast on the next day and all strolled out through the open windows. The tide of guests had ebbed away some days since, and the party was once more reduced to its former numbers.

"Ye," said Olimpia, "the clear old orange-trees and the terra cotta vases go far to heighten the illusion—so long as one avoids looking back at the house."

"Or round upon the landscape," suggested Saxon, smiling; "for these park trees are as English as the architecture of the house. What is the style, Castletowers?"

"Oh, I don't know. Elizabethan—Tudor—English-Gothic. I suppose they all mean the same thing. Shall I cut down my poor old oaks, Miss Colonna, and plant olives and poplars in their place?"

"Yes, if you will give me the Sabine for the Surrey hills, and an Italian sky instead of ours."

"I would if I could—I wish it were possible," said Castletowers, earnestly.

"No, I always see them," replied Olimpia, with a sigh. "I see them wow—so plainly!"

"But you Italians never have the mal de pays," said Saxon.

"How can you tell that, Mr. Trefalden? I think we have."

"No, no. You love your Italy; but you do not suffer in absence as we suffer. The true mal de pays runs in no blood but the Celtic."

"You will not persuade me that you love Switzerland better than we love Italy," said Olimpia.

"But I believe we do," replied Saxon. "Your amor patria is, perhaps, a more intellectual passion than ours. It is bound up with your wonderful history, your pride of blood and pride of place; but I can not help believing that we Swiss do actually cherish a more animal feeling for our native soil."

"For the soil?" repeated Castletowers.

"Yes, for the clay beneath our feet and the peaks above our heads. Our mountains are as dear to us as if they were living things, and could love us back again. They enter into our inner consciousness. They exercise a subtle influence upon our minds, and upon our bodies through our minds. They are a part of ourselves."

"Metaphorically speaking," said the Earl.

"Their effects are not metaphorical," replied Saxon.

"What are their effects?"

"What we were speaking of just now—the mal de pays; the sickness in banishment."

"But that is a sickness of the mind," said Olimpia.

"Not at all. It is a physical malady."

"May one inquire how it attacks the patient?" asked the Earl, incredulously.

Saxon was suddenly stricken down, as if by a coup de soleil. Some fade slowly away. In either case it is the inexpressible longing, for which there is no cure save Switzerland."

"And supposing that your invalid can not get away—what then?"

"I don't—he would die."

The Earl laughed aloud.

"And I fear he would do nothing of the kind," said he. "Depend on it, Trefalden, this is one of those pretty fictions that every body believes and nobody can prove."

"My dear Gervase," said Lady Castletowers, passing the little group as she returned to the house, "Signor Colonna is waiting to speak to you."

Colonna was leaning over the balustrade at the farther end of the terrace, reading a letter. He looked up as the Earl approached, and said, eagerly,

"A dispatch from Baldiseroti! Garibaldi has sailed from Genoa in the Piemonte, and Bixio in the Lombardo. The word is drawn at last, and the scabbard thrown away!"

The Earl's face flushed with excitement.

"This is great news," said he. "When did it come?"

"With the other letters; but I waited to tell it to you when your mother was not present."

"Does Vaughan know?"

"Not yet. He went to his room when he left the breakfast-table, and I have not seen him since."

"What is the strength of the expedition?"

"One thousand and sixty-seven."

"No more?"

"Thousands more; but they have at present no means of transport. This is but an advanced guard of tried men; chiefly old Cacciatori. Genoa is full of volunteers, all eager to embark."

"I would give ten years from my life to be among them," said Castletowers, earnestly.

The Italian laid his hand caressingly upon the young man's arm.

"Fazienza caro," he replied. "You do good service here. Come with me to my room. There is work for us this morning."

The Earl glanced toward Olimpia and Saxon, opened his lips, as if to speak; checked himself, and followed somewhat reluctantly.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

A BROKEN PROMISE.

It must be conceded that Miss Colonna had not made the most of her opportunities. She had not actually withdrawn from the field, but she had failed to follow up her first great move so closely as a less reluctant player might have done. And yet she meant to act this part which she had undertaken. She knew that, if she did so, it must be at the sacrifice of her own peace of her own womanly self-respect. She was quite aware, too, that it involved a cruel injustice to Saxon Trefalden. But with her, as with all enthusiasts, the greater duty included the less; and she believed that, although it would be morally wrong to do these things for any other end, it would be practically right to do them for Italy.

If she could not bring herself to heal this generous heart utterly without a struggle—if she pitied the lad's fate and loathed her own, and shrunk from the path that she was pledged to tread—she did so by reason of the finer part of her nature, but contrary to her convictions of duty. For, to her, Italy was duty; and when her instinctive sense of right stepped in, as it had stepped in now, she blamed herself bitterly.

But this morning's post had brought matters to a crisis. Her father's face, as he handed her the dispatch marked with Red Cross, told her that; and she knew that if she was ever to act decisively, she must act so now. When, therefore, she found herself alone with Saxon on the terrace she scarcely paused to think how she should begin, but plunged at once into her task.

"You must not think we love our country less passionately than the Swiss, Mr. Trefalden," she said, quickly. "I am sure that you pay to prove the heart of a people; and when you know us better, you will, I am sure, be one of the first to acknowledge that the Italian race while I can not be happy till I convince you."

"I am glad you think me worth the trouble of convincing," replied Saxon.

"How should I not? You are a patriot and a republican."

"That I am, heart and soul!" said Saxon, with sparkling eyes.

"We ought to have many sympathies in common."

"Why, so we have. The love of country and the love of true liberty should unite in common."

"They should be," replied Olimpia; "but, alas! between prosperity and adversity there can be little real fellowship. Yours, Mr. Trefalden, is the happiest land in Europe, and mine is the most miserable."

"I wish yours were not so," said Saxon.

"I wish with all my heart it may not remain so! Wish that women's tears and brave men's blood may not be shed in vain; nor a whole people be trodden back from the verge of the grave by a fitfully timely help in the moment of their utmost need!"

"What do you mean?" said Saxon, catching something of her excitement, without knowing why or wherefore.

"I mean that the work to which my father's whole life has been given is at last begun. You know—all the world knows—that Italy is in arms; but you have not yet been told that an army of liberation is assembling in the north."

"In the north? Then the King of Sardinia—"

"Victor Emanuel is willing enough to reap the harvest we have sowed for him," replied Miss Colonna, impetuously; "but he will not offer us even a hearty 'God-speed' at present. No, Mr. Trefalden, we are left to rely on volunteers and patriots only—an army of young, brave, and generous hearts that love Italy and liberty, and are ready to die for what they love."

Beautiful as she was at all times, Saxon had never seen Olimpia Colonna look so beautiful as when she spoke these words. He almost lost the sense of what she was saying in thinking of how she looked while saying it. He stammered something unintelligible, and she went on.

"Garibaldi has gone to Genoa, England, as advanced-guard. Volunteers are pouring into Genoa from Venice and Milan. Subscriptions are being raised in Germany, England, in France, in Belgium, in America. A month hence and South Italy will be free or doubly chained. In the mean while we need help; and for that help we look to every lover of liberty. You are a lover of liberty, and you have not been a model republic. What will you do for us?"

"Tell me what to do, and I will do it," said Saxon.

"Nay; I might ask too much."

"You can not ask more than I will gladly grant."

Olimpia turned her dazzling smile upon him.

"Beware!" said she. "I may take you at your word. Tell me—remember, this is a prepaid personal, and does not belong to the ordinary list of applications—what is the most appropriate poetry that can be begged, borrowed, or stolen, or coined from the brain oblivion?"

Finding he made no answer, she spoke again, in a soft, tremulous tone that would have turned the head of St. Kevan himself.

"Why for me? What am I that you should do more for me than for my country?"

"I—I would do any thing for you," faltered Saxon.

"Are you sure of that?"

"As sure as that I—"

The lad checked himself. He wonna have said, "as that I live," but he lacked courage to pronounce the words. Miss Colonna knew it, however, as well as if he had said it.

"Would you jump into the sea for me, like Schiller's diver?" she asked, with a sudden change of mood, and a laugh like a peal of silver bells.

"That I would!"

"Or in among the fighting lions, like the Count de Lorge?"

"I know nothing about the Count de Lorge, but I would do for you all that a brave man dare do for a fair lady," replied Saxon, hotly.

"Thanks," she said, and her smile became graver as she spoke. "I think you mean what you say."

"I do. Indeed I do!"

"I believe it. Some day, perhaps, I shall put you to the proof."

With this she gave him her hand, and hastily withdrew before he did, but feeling that he would cheerfully march up to a battery, or jump out of a balloon, or lie down in the path of an express train, for her sake—kissed it!

And then he was so overwhelmed by the knowledge of what he had done that he scarcely noticed how gently Miss Colonna withdrew her hand from his, and turned away.

He watched her across the terrace. She did not look back. She went thoughtfully forward, thoughtfully and slowly, with her hands clasped loosely together and her head a little bent; but her bearing was not that of a person in anger. When she had passed into the house Saxon drew a deep breath, paused for a moment irresolute, and presently swung himself lightly over the parapet and plunged into the park.

He had need to run a while, and he wandered about for the first half hour or so in a tumult of rapturous wonder and exultation—and then he suddenly remembered that he had broken his promise to William Trefalden!

In the mean while Olimpia went up to her father's study in the turret, and stood before him, pale and silent, like a marble statue of herself.

Colonna looked up, and pushed his papers aside.

"Well!" he said, eagerly, "what speed?"

"This."

Saying which she took a pen, deliberately filled in Saxon's name penciled on the majority, and laid Saxon's check before him on the table.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

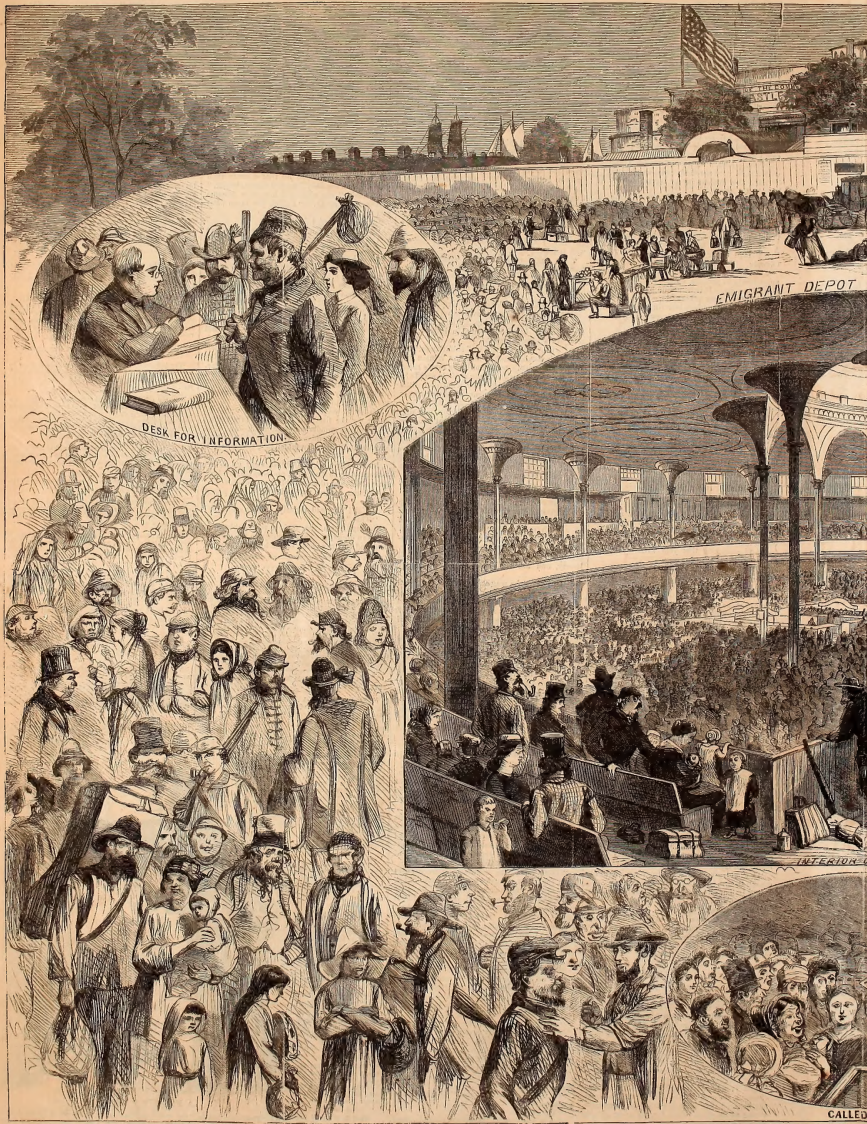

TABLE OF INTEREST.—The dinner-table.

Not long ago the rector of a parish in ——shire was surprised by a request from an old woman in his village, that he would give her a seat in the church quite close to the pulpit. "Why, Mary," said he, "you're not deaf enough yet by can hear my sermons very well where you now sit." "No, Sir," said the old woman, "that be true enough; but you see there be Betty Stubbs, and Bill Jones, and Mary Ann sitting right in front of me with their mouths all wide open, and taking it all in, and by the time it comes to me there's very little left."

Which is the oldest tree known to man?—The elder tree, of course.

MARRIAGE NOTICES.—A Western paper gives the following notice of the marriage of marriages, where no fashion is cent, will be set up in small type, and poked into some outlandish corner of the paper.

"Married, on the 3d inst., by the Rev. Mr. Jones, Mr. Mary Ann Smith, all of this county. That is true enough; but you see there be Betty Stubbs, and Bill Jones, and

THE FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH.

'Twas a beautiful dream of the ancient time,
Of the wondrous minds of old;
That fountain that could renew the prime,
The beauty, the purple light enshrine,
That defies mortal mould.

But, alas! though fresh as the dewy dawn
The bowl o'ers from may be
And though crowned with such light as might have shone
From the bow when hail through the stream passed on
To immortality;

Yet it blooms and dies, with sure decay,
For there's nought as sure as change;
Ay, mortal! thy spirit is flitting away
As then poured out from the cup of thy short day,
With thy reason's shorter range.

But the poets, who lived, and hoped, and dreamed,
In that old fabling age,
'Neath the sprit of the fountain may have deemed
It a water of life, for its baptism seemed
Of a higher life to shine.

And this telling, travelling world still clings,
In each round, to this self-same truth;
And each generation hopes better things—
More yearnin' for swift, earth-spurning wings,
And the crown of immortal youth.

MY AUNT DAGON'S MISSION.

I HAD come to Newport, as my Aunt Dagon expressed it, to see a little of the world; but I knew perfectly well that my business there was to get married. Aunt Dagon had already married off two of my sisters, and now she had taken me in hand. It promised to be her most difficult achievement, for I was not beautiful like the others. To make amends they had accomplished me to the last degree. They went operas and I—knew you had them. Ballads?—I sang all the tenderest ones. Was it reading?—An elocutionist of note had pronounced me a very rapid. Dancing?—had not danced ever since I was as tall as a violin? I had some genius, and that helped. I had tastes certainly—feelings, probably; should have had a heart if circumstances had admitted of it; and yet I had come to Newport with Aunt Dagon to get married.

On our way from my quiet country home to the scene of action we had stopped at my aunt's house in New York, and made ready our armor—weapons of offense and defense, in the shape of round hats, hats à la mousquetaire, veils, dresses for each hour in the day, and all the lesser matters of sashes, gloves, furs, and handkerchiefs. Aunt Dagon was not married herself, nor other people, but she knew things thoroughly well, and was determined her nieces should not fail for want of ammunition, though she grumbled a little at war prices.

She was a childless widow, and very rich; or as I used to say, her annual income from a very large property, which after her death would revert to Dagon heirs; so all she could do for her own kin must be done in her lifetime. She regarded it as her mission in life to marry off the daughters of her only sister, my mother, who had wedded on the love-in-a-cottage principle, and then killed that cottage full of girls. Already, by means of Aunt Dagon's skillful management, Katie was Mrs. Lorlird, with a house in Madison Square as handsome as Aunt Dagon's own, and only the slight encumbrance of a husband, bland, unprincipled, selfish, and a dozen years older than herself. Margaret was Mrs. Minturn, and her husband was a man of whom no one could find fault with other endowments besides wealth. The only trouble was that Margaret did not love him, and had loved, ever since her days of pinafores and pantalets, a certain never-to-wed lad at home. But she had too much sense to make a romantic marriage; and if Mr. Minturn found her a student's sort of wife, he had an ample ground for complaint in her cool self-possession, and the sublime but icy grace with which she did the honors of his establishment. She appeared, certainly, the very last woman in the world to be sentimental over a moonlight scene. Still, truth to tell, I don't know that either of my sisters was happy enough to make me desire to change places with her; yet I was sure I had been Dagonized into a belief that I must marry money and position, or my career would be a failure.

Before I left home in Newport a week I had ceased to speculate about people in general, though, of course, I could and did hush and drive and flirt with whoever came in my way, after the manner of Newport society; and succeeded, too, quite beyond the expectations of my kinswomen in rendering myself generally agreeable. But my real interest was confined to two men, of whom I was making a study, as no one had been recommended to my attention by my aunt—the other had unconsciously recommended himself by some words I had heard him say one evening. Of course Mr. Vandervoort deserves first mention. He was worth more than half a million of money. His name was an old one, his family thoroughbred, all things—a gentleman by education and inheritance. The cultured manner, and polished courtesy which dominated in him, the only Vandervoort of his family in this generation. It was no wonder that Aunt Dagon's eyes were dazzled, or that she enlarged with enthusiasm upon his good points.

"If you only could win him, Marcia," she had said, during our first week. "If he had been only handsome as Kate or Margaret I should have had some hope; but now it is so desperately impossible that—"

"That perhaps I had better try where there is a more reasonable prospect of success?" I suggested, coolly finishing for her the sentence at which she had hesitated.

Maurice Tréjeler was a man of a different type; younger, not handsomer, perhaps, unless to those who judge a face by its expression. He was—what shall I call him?—decidedly an author, for he had published no books—literateur, perhaps. He had nothing to depend on in life but his own brains, and so he was making his way slowly. He had put himself through college, what with teaching and economizing, and now he had engagements with one or two papers, and as many magazines, for which he wrote regularly. On the proceeds he lived in a manner not beneath the dignity of a gentleman; though all he earned in a year would not have been enough to buy the amount of feminine fineries my aunt had provided for my summer expedition. You see no one could possibly have been more ineligible.

He was at Newport as the guest of a great politician, whose wife was a cousin of Aunt Dagon's, and I should have been more than woman not to appreciate the compliment it conveyed. There was something very fascinating about him. He was handsomer at thirty-five than he could have been when ten years younger—handsome, with a mature beauty which was common enough to attract any bovish grace. Yet something was wanting—a subtle something which I felt but could not have expressed. Mr. Vandervoort I married Mr. Vandervoort—handsome, gracious, courtly, worthy even of respect as he undoubtedly was—there would be hours and months in which I should be most utterly alone. I knew that one part of my nature would be entirely unwedded; that for me earth and sea and sky had a language which he would never hear. These thoughts passed through my mind rapidly; and then I began to wonder whether it was not so in marriages; whether the difference that troubled me was not the essential and integral difference between man and woman? If only one loved deeply, was dearly loved—that, after all, was the great thing! It would be selfish sentiment merely to expect every thing to be adored, every thought understood. So I walked on, under the full moon, and in sight of the great, glorious, shifting sea, with Ignatius Valdevron.

There was witchery in the hour—in the scene. The sparkling dark eyes, the dusky olive cheek and sea; the low rime of the tide coming in; the melancholy, murmurous voices of the summer night; if there was a time of poetry or sentiment in the heart of a man—any thing which claimed kinship with all that was lofty, all that was tender in the soul of a woman—surely this hour must bring it to the surface. Under its influence we fell into silence; but still, as two in a dream, we walked on. Mr. Vandervoort stopped, and looked by the moonlight into my eyes.

"What is this spell you have for me, Miss Ayrault?" he said. "Is it your influence over me so curious. I have never felt the same before. I must see more of you, and try to understand it."

He had spoken with singular transparency, of which I think he had hardly been conscious. I knew his heart as well as well as he himself did —knew that he was mentally saying:

"How curiously this girl, whom I have known as a short acquaintance, affects me. Is it possible that I am in love with her? If I am, I might as well marry her. But I must be cautious—make sure; it will not do to commit a blunder. I must be certain that I shall be happier as a married man before I give up my freedom."

Just as far as that, his speculations went. That I would accept him if he asked me he had not the shadow of a doubt. How should he have, when all his women had been educated into considering it flatter him?—when he had become accustomed to be angled for?

I thought he had gone far enough for that night —that I could trust him not to forget me before the next day—at all events, I meant to get it.

When I bade Aunt Dagon good-night in her own room, as was my habit, she said nothing of Mr. Vandervoort, thought, no doubt, younger that she was knowing when to let well enough alone. She only kissed me with what I fully understood to be a kiss of approval.

My sister Kate—have I mentioned that Mrs. Lorlard and Mrs. Minturn were both at Newport?—met me on the piazza. I went up, and stopped to whisper gayly, "Bravo, brown-eyed Marcia! You will be better than any of us, in spite of your sex retrousse!"

Last of all, Margaret came into my room while I was undressing, and looked as I had never seen her look before—strangely moved and excited. She watched me while my aunt's maid brushed out my hair and put it in curling-pins, with a tender, eager glitter in her blue eyes and a color feverishly bright on her cheeks. Then, when we were alone, she said, abruptly:

"Marcia, it would be very easy for you to make that man love you. I have never seen him so much interested in any woman."

"What man?" I asked, with an affectation of carelessness.

"Don't tride, Marcia! You know I mean Mr. Vandervoort. Don't marry him unless you love him. Don't let Aunt Dagon persuade you. I know what her powers are. A woman who marries a man she does not love sins against her own soul. That's you all. I tell you if you do you will repent it all your life. If you love him, very well. If you don't, remember the whole world won't profit you if, to gain it, you lose your own soul."

I looked at my sister in amazement. I had never before at all understood the depth and passion of her nature. All three years that she had married so cold had this wild fire burned at her heart? Had the early love-dream for her—her married life no hold- Her sheltered my thoughts.

"Yes," she said, sadly: "I know that I at once reveal and humiliate myself; but that is nothing if I can save you."

Then she kissed me with burning, feverish lips, and went away.

When she was gone I threw open my window and sat down before it. In the distance rolled the moon, toward that sea, I had walked with Mr. Vandervoort. Did I—could I ever—love him? I thought I could. If there were a little less power in the magnetism of Maurice Tréjeler. Why had my evil fate brought him to Newport—a man whom I could never marry? Why had I seen that night before, and spoken with an irony under which I winced, and who yet perversely occupied my fancy, and remained in my mind as a standard of comparison by which I tried other men and found them wanting? After all, did I not like better the gracious dignity of Mr. Vandervoort? Then I tried to decide what I should think of them if they were both rich, or both poor—found the result of my musings unsatisfactory, shut my window, and went to bed.

The next day Mr. Vandervoort seemed resolved to pursue his investigations—to understand the secret of my influence over him. He asked me to ride with him. I went down with my long black habit, my black hat and scarlet feather, and stopped on the way to say good-by to Aunt Dagon.

"You look well, niece," she said, after a critical survey, "and you ride well, too. You somehow you need not be afraid of a comparison with either Kate or Margaret."

On the piazza Margaret stood, waiting to see me off. She had regained all her usual calm dignity. She looked perfectly happy and self-possessed, as she stood there in her dove-colored blue silk, listening to her husband as he talked politics with Mr. Tréjeler.

But she turned away with a whisper in my ear a sentence which no one else heard:

"Marcia, what shall it profit a woman if she gain the whole world and lose herself?"

In spite of her warning, however, I took pleasure in my ride. My horse was splendid, as was every thing that belonged to Mr. Vandervoort. Riding was one of the society accomplishments in which I had been trained, and I enjoyed it excessively. There was no uncertainty for strangers, but I perceived a tender deference in Mr. Vandervoort's manner, as he took me from one point to our return, which convinced me that my morning had not been thrown away.

That evening Mr. Tréjeler approached me gravely.

"The moon rises later to-night, Miss Ayrault—as not quite so full. The night will be less splendid, and more suitable, therefore, for a walk for Mr. Vandervoort. Will you give me a little of it?"

I was not in the humor to deny myself the pleasure I could not help taking in his society. As a matter of policy, moreover, it was just as well to let Mr. Vandervoort see that I was not all his own. So even Aunt Dagon did not frown when I walked out with Mr. Tréjeler. Her two years' stay in common-sense was of course too great for her to imagine any danger.

I can hardly tell what we talked about—the night, at first, I think, and the sea. Then from the sea's immensity, I know, we got to speaking about the immensity of unknown worlds, the future in which all this life's factitious glory and greatness would be as nothing, and only the "real I am" could comprehend the solemn grandeur of Heaven. And, as we talked, the conviction stole slowly into my mind that for me nothing was waiting in Madison Square—that he would see thoroughly, and lecture our natures was no jar or discordance. I could not fancy myself in love with him. I still looked upon that as a thing that must not, and therefore could not be—I only knew that, if Fate had ordained either of us for the other, I could have found in him the answer to all my heart's needs.

The hour with its beauty and mystery, the talk about the things most sacred to us both—eternal verities of which it was impossible to speak lightly —had brought us strangely near to each other; made us better acquainted than weeks of ordinary intercourse would have done. It was a strange coincidence that he spoke at last almost the same words which Mr. Vandervoort had used.

"What is this spell you have for me—spell which no woman ever had before?"

Then there was silence—a silence in which we heard only the murmuring sea, and the still, solemn voices of the night—a silence which at length he broke.

"Miss Ayrault, I know what the spell is. It is the harmony between your soul and mine. I could love you, I know, with all the force of my being. If I were not a poor man I should ask you for my wife. I made scarcely twelve hundred dollars last year—what would that do for us?"

"It would be half the stories, perhaps, with which Aunt Dagon provided me for this Newport campaign," I said then, impelled by the perfect harmony in our natures, I went on as if I had been thinking aloud, with a frankness at which I wondered myself after as much as he could.

"No, it would never do. I too believe that we could love each other well, but we must not. If you were self-constituted afterward my critic. I have been educated all my life with a view to making a rich marriage, as my sisters have. It is to Aunt Dagon's mission brought me here. I should only hamper you if we came together. You, too, ought to marry money, or at least to be free to make your own way in the world—unfettered."

"I should have no fears," he said, with that calm self-reliance which had so much charm for me, "but I can well be discontented afterward it is another matter. I must not urge you. Only we shall speak know of our lives that a full, perfect happiness just missed us."

Then we went in.

At the door he asked me for the bunch of English violets which I wore. They were my favorite flower, and I put on a fresh bunch every evening.

"They are not worth giving," I said. "Don't you know that fragrance is the greatest fraud in the world? To-morrow, no matter what care you take of them, they will be scentless as withered leaves."

"All the fitter reminder they will be, then, of a dream too sweet to last," he said; and then I gave them to him.

The next day Mr. Vandervoort—having at length, I suppose, satisfied himself that my attraction for him was in reality—asked me to marry him. His words, though calm, were very earnest and tender, and—if they failed utterly to touch my heart. Whatever spell / had not Mr. Vandervoort he had none for me. Still I had not the present strength decidedly to refuse him. Here lay, right within my grasp, the prize for which my whole life had been a preparatory struggle. I had made up my mind that to marry Maurice Tripier was out of the question, and I certainly did not intend to live single. What could I ask, then, more or better than Mr. Vandervoort? A man rich by inheritance, well-born, well-bred, of a handsome character, and honestly in love with me! I must be blind indeed to my own interest to let such a prize slip through my fingers. Yet I was not quite prepared to wear the glittering diamond fetter which I knew was ready for me. I put off my decision for a week, and took that time to reconcile myself to my destiny.

Meanwhile I kept my own counsel. Neither Aunt Dagon nor either of my sisters knew that he had proposed to me. But they saw my attentions and fondness, and my aunt's manner grew blander than ever. I was in a state of utter indecision myself. I liked Mr. Vandervoort thoroughly — as well as ever since that I might not have loved him a little if I had not seen another whom I knew I could love a great deal. Then I was ambitious—it was impossible from such a rearing as I had had. I loved luxury and ease—of self-denial and privation I was not fond. I had seen enough of them in my own family, where a large family had been brought up on small means, though each of us had our turn, at eighteen, of flowering into splendor under Aunt Dagon's auspices. As Mr. Vandervoort's wife I could have the delight of feeling free regardless of expense. What a temptation it was! I very nearly made up my mind to that destiny.

At length came the very last night of my week of probation. The next morning I thought I was going to say yes to Mr. Vandervoort. Meantime I had one evening of freedom, and that I meant to rejoice.

Some one asked me to sing, and I gave them an old song — and I was in no mood then for tender love-songs from Tennyson. When I rose from the piano Maurice Tripier was beside me.

"I am going to leave Newport to-morrow," he said. "Shall I infringe on any one's right if I ask you to indulge me with one last little walk?"

For the whole week past he had seemed to avoid me. He had been resolved, evidently, that he would not interfere with my ambition. I could not resist his pleading eyes, now—or my own heart, which pleaded as well. So we went out.

This night, too, was no moon—only the stars shone with a clear, far-off, unsympathizing light. Silence and mystery were on the waters, and so hence was I myself. It seemed as if I could or if I had any thing to say, in the shadow of that near parting which was to separate us for years, if not for ever. Who knew if any wave of Time would ever strand us again on the same shore? He spoke at length, when we had reached a little knoll, where we stood still, and looked off over the dark, ever-murmuring waters.

"I loved you well, Marcia," he said; "will you remember it?"

I answered his question with another.

"Do you know my utterly poor I am?"

"Poor in purse, yes; rich in what I most value."

"Are you sorry I had married you, and you had to struggle on for us both, you would never have regretted it?"

"Regretted it! Oh, Marcia, if you would have tried me!"

What tenderness, what longing, thrilled in his voice!

"I think I will," I said, softly.

"Mr. Vandervoort! Are you not engaged to him?"

"No. I have been laboring to make up my mind to it," was to give him his answer to-morrow. I think I will give it to him to-night—instead."

"And you mean it, Marcia? Mean that you will try life with me, poverty and all?"

"Yes, I mean it."

What we said in the next half hour I will not repeat, for I seem to be the reputation of a woman of sense. By the end of it we had begun to plan out our future, and were gay and happy as two children.

"I suppose all your fineries, put together, Marcia, did not cost Aunt Dagon above two thousand dollars, did they?" he asked, gravely, as we were going in.

"Just about that, I imagine."

"Well, we'll pay her—I have just that sum saved up—and you'll feel independent, and she'll have no bills to ever accuse her disagreeably of."

"Why, she wouldn't take it, you foolish fellow!" and I laughed at his earnestness. You shall keep it, instead, to settle the little Pardies where I'm to play Eve to your Adam."

"And where, please God, the serpent shall never come," he said, his merriment replaced by his seriousness.

I went in and chanced to meet Mr. Vandervoort who had been looking for me, I think. "May I speak to you a moment?" I asked.

He turned and went out on the piazza with me, evidently wondering at my manner.

"I would not wait till to-morrow," I said, as soon as we were alone. "I thought it wrong to keep you a moment in suspense, after I knew my own heart. I honor you so truly, and care for you so much, that it is a real pain to have to say that I do not also love you."

He looked absolutely struck dumb with surprise. The idea of refusal in vain had evidently never been familiar to his imagination.

"You mean that you will not marry me?" he asked, after a moment.

"That I can not," I said, "because I do not love you as a wife ought."

Then he suggested something about time; and I told him frankly of my engagement to Mr. Tripier.

His manner changed instantly.

"I am glad you told me that," he said, with real warmth. "I have convinced me that there is one woman whom gold can not win. Tripier has nothing but himself, and I—"

"You are the rich Mr. Vandervoort," I said, "but I never could have married you without loving you. Believe me I did not mean to trifle. I thought I could love you at last."

"At last," he answered, "you have taught me to honor you, and we can be friends."

That night, too, I told Aunt Dagon. I knew I should feel better if I had it all well over.

"I am ready to leave Newport to-morrow, if you please," I said to her.

"Is your work done? Are you engaged?" she asked, with an eagerness which for once made her thoroughly human.

"Yes, to Maurice Tripier."

She looked steadily into my eyes. She read there, I imagine, a resolution with which she knew it would be of no use to contend. She was not a woman given to much feeling, but I am afraid I had told Mr. Vandervoort, and when I answered yes, she said, grimly:

"Well, then, your work is done. But we may as well stay our time out. You will never see Newport again, probably."

The next day Mr. Tripier went away; and the next week Mr. Vandervoort. After that we staid nearly two months longer. Aunt Dagon was not paramount to know the failure of her mission in my behalf troubled her.

But it was unpleasant enough for all. This summer she has spent the money which would have bought a bridal offering of plate or jewels for Mr. Vandervoort's wife in giving a dinner and carriages for our house—Maurice's and mine. So we shall have his two thousand dollars to keep, as my aunt says, "for a nest-egg—small one, but it will be a touch of the old grimness. But I shall never envy Kate or Margaret.

PUBLIC LOCOMOTION IN THE UNITED STATES.

FROM DR. DALPEE'S "Thoughts on American Civil Policy," shortly to be published by Ticknor & Brothers.

TALLEYRAND, when speaking of the United States to the Emperor Napoleon, made this remark: "It is a giant without bones." That was before there were any railroads; but since the latter the bones have begun to grow, and they are bones of iron.

Now, since there is an unceasing tendency to the modification of the human race by the operation of climate, and evils ensue both by a community existing too long in one locality, and by living into a stagnant condition, and by the antagonisms that arise between contentious communities that have been separated into different states, it is very plain that the thing of primary importance to be accomplished is, as far as may be possible, to prevent such climatic evils and such their effect. This can only be done by promoting locomotion.

It is therefore unwise to give legislative encouragement to any thing that tends to isolate communities, or even families, too stationary. Fortunately, the instinctive disposition, in this respect, are greatly facilitated by the established usages respecting the inheritance of property and the universal breaking up of families. As a fact, factual is the system of agriculture, if such it can be called, that we pursue—our practice of killing land, and that the most undergoes deterioration of its essential ingredients, as bone-earth, potash, or the like, can not be economically restored. It is much cheaper to abandon the former waste and move to the virgin lands of the West. That love of the homestead, so characteristic of the settled population of Europe, can scarcely be said to exist among us. The children leave their father's hearth without reluctance, for he is perpetually anticipating leaving it himself. It might have been feared—perhaps was feared by many observant persons—that the loss of local attachments, and even the loss of national sentiment, but the experience of the civil war has shown the incorrectness of such a foreboding. The history of it can not be further cited here, but it can not be forgotten that we furnish a more splendid example of unwavering fortitude, unshrinking self-sacrifice, in vindication of national life. The sense of loss has not been a compensation to be eye-witnesses, will by future generations of historians be quoted as the point in the greatest glory of their history—an incentive in their inevitable march to imperial greatness, a firm support in their dark hours.

The customs and usages of American domestic life have, therefore, to a certain extent, made us a locomotive people. Not unfrequently, even many foreign travelers affirmed that we are essentially a nomadic race. It is well for our future that we are so.

It should be a settled principle of American legislation to encourage in every possible manner facilities for intercourse between the remotest of the most effectual way any thing that might possibly act as a restraint.

From the results of the policy that has been pursued in the case of the Post-office system very valuable suggestions may be derived. By reducing the cost of the transmission of letters and newspapers to the smallest possible amount conspicuous benefits have been the result. Since the family tie has been knit in spite of separation, the public intellect has been enlarged by the diffusion of general information. That mental activity which arises from the concentration of masses of men in great cities is felt sympathetically in the most sparsely peopled and distant country places. During the civil war metropolitan journalism has very where been a powerful auxiliary to the cause.

But it is not enough that there should be free movement for thought; free movement for the people themselves is of equal importance. Both act in the closest relation of cause and effect. The Southern States for the last few years have had a most amazing stream of Northern travel in every direction the civil war would not have occurred.

Experience shows that travel increases as it cost diminishes. Whatever, therefore, operates as a tax on locomotion is inconsistent with the highest principles of State policy. No community should be permitted to take advantage of the geographical position it may happen to occupy for the purpose of exacting a toll for its own profit. Such practices may suit an Arab sheik or other Asiatic chieftain, who levies a contribution on the passing caravan, but is altogether inadmissible in a modernized society. A community can not perpetrate this act without becoming politically debauched and demoralized. It is an offense against the highest public interests.

When the railway system was first being developed in England measures were taken to give to the Government an eventual and thorough control over it. Already in that country it is agitated to consummate those measures by the State assuming the proprietorship of the roads, equalizing their rates of charges, and reducing those rates to a minimum. There can be no doubt that such a consummation would produce very powerful social effects. In its direction as to the time of the consummation of that the changes in the postal system have done, those social effects being all of an advantageous kind. But England, her comparatively restricted geographical extent being considered, is not pressed by those climate considerations that are of such paramount interest in America. Her reasons for action in the matter are therefore, it may be said, of a very subordinate kind compared with those that concern us. In America transportation at the lowest possible cost assumes the attitude of an affair of the highest political necessity.

In view of that state necessity all local and individual interests must be compelled to give way. How far in future generations these problems are publicly better understood than at present, it may be found politically expedient to give to the general government control over the whole subject of carrying the principles here indicated into effect, it is needless at present to consider.

PATIENCE.

"What is long sought Comes when unsought."

I LAUNCHED my bark upon the little bay.
And sailed out to the dark and lonely sea.
The sea that murmure to itself all day.
And seemed, I thought, to murmur unto me:

"Cease hither to my bread and heaving breast,
For I have treasures deep and manifold;
Inglorious sailor, cease, and rest with me,
Come hither to my jewels and my gold!"

I sailed out to the dark and lonely sea,
And heard the tempest's melancholy wail;
The spirits of the storm-fiends passed by me,
And distant vessels quivered in the gale.

I found no treasure; but an empty wreck—
Sad wreck of the departed and the lost—
Placed the shell to my ear, and heard
And voyaged homeward sad and tempest-tost.

Long, long, I watched upon the sea-girt height,
And lower down I watched upon the sand;
The anxious watching night and day and night,
And yet my treasure never came to land.

At last mine eyes were lifted to the skies,
Forgetting hopes and longings once so sweet,
When lo! the treasure that I sought met my eyes,
And laid the longed-for treasure at my feet.

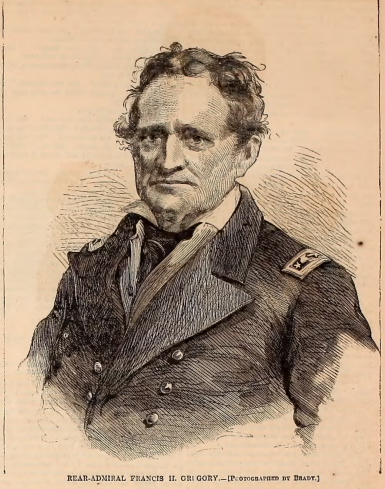
INTERESTING ITEMS.

WOLFE AND BRAG.—The country people of the Low Countries have a fashion of boasting their prowess and valiant exploits with apparently twice as much straw as needs be; but the stories which they tell are often too true to need any additions of making more. Many, when they don't go hereabouts, sport wonderful tales of their feats of coolness. Hill pastures are short class, as in Switzerland, the hay in many cases being so fine as to necessitate it to be gathered and tied up in sheets for transport home. The following is the way to reap a cornfield on a hill-side in this place. Not to leave their sheep to the attacks of wolves, they have them with them, and, mixed on stakes, and during the night in an apartment of similar shape and material to that in which they live, are the sheep's guards. Many speak only Russian, a language which no Christian stranger would ever learn, though the natives are very commonly proud of it. When they talk French they talk it with a Russian accent, and the latter is distinguished by words which are usually allowed to drop unheard; for instance, "Bonjour, Monsieur," is spoken as "Bonjour, Monsieur." As a trait of simple honesty, a traveler who slept at Orlow by village name Pogodi, left his watch behind him, and was very far from the frontier, sent out for the day, leaving his portmanteau open, when the landlords sent money on his invisible table. On his return the people of the inn put the watch into his hand, and he left the house free of molestation than if they had had his night-cap in its proper place. Such is the honesty of the country, and young people are in some few people's households, in the course of training for other countries, as in the case of Peter Pigeau, out on an official tour, passed through a village where the inhabitants, with the usual hospitality, recommended to his charity a poor woman, whose husband, as they said, had been killed in the wars. "Is she a widow?" asked the traveler. "Not exactly," was the reply; "she is a widow, but her husband is not dead." "Then why do you call her a widow?" asked the astonished Peter. "Why, you see," was the reply, "we are poor people, and we don't like to be Poles, indeed I do. It's all the poor dear man left me to remember him by."

THE LATE EMPEROR'S WILL.—There is a certain testamentary paper, scarcely to be called a will, among the records of Doctors' Commons, which is entitled simply "The last act" of a great drama played on the broad stage of the world by one of its principal actors; now fifty-seventy years have rolled away, lives, and will live, in the memory of neighbors, friends, and foes. This is the only document prepared by an eminent firm, comprised in twenty lines. The testator, a man nearly bound together, evidently executed while the testator was in the heyday of his fame and fortune, and while the world was at his feet. A sheet of the coarse white paper then in vogue, interlined and indented, the final directions of a broken-spirited, penniless, dying man. A strange anomaly. Here was a man who had "enjoyed the rod of empire," telling his old friend, when he urged him to make a will, that it was of no use, he had nothing to leave. Never, before that, had died a Prince Minister so poor. The will, an exact copy of which, so far as the writing is concerned, we can now read in Lord Stanhope's Memoirs, is in these little sentences, each paragraph of a line. The handwriting is that of the Bishop of Lincoln; but it appears, from a sentence in weak, struggling characters, difficult to read, that he corrected and abandoned, that the testator once attempted to write himself, but was compelled to resign the pen. Could the paper speak, what a touching tale it might unfold of that last scene at Putney! In forty-seven years Pitt's race was run; in thirty-six that of his friend and Wolfe Canning's designate "the most celebrated Englishman of the nineteenth century"! but a world of emotion, excitement, and event their brief span in other cases embraced! Such men, in both, exhaust more life in one decade than the commoner clay in five.

THE Paris Journal publishes the following anecdote, which our readers may please themselves about believing: "A quarrel took place about some trifle between Sir Edward K——, an English gentleman, very well known in Paris, and Count Alfred de Grammont, of the Horse Guards. The seconds had in vain endeavored to reconcile them, and it was decided to have recourse to arms; but as both the principals were first-rate shots and swordsmen, it was agreed that the duel should be a sabre fight. The sleeves, similar in every external respect, had one of them prepared in such a manner that it should scratch and prove mortal to the smoker, were placed on the table. The combatants threw off their coats, and, after a weapon of war were then lighted, and after a few puffs on either side the cigars were lit forward till on his lips. He, however, immediately got up and was surrounded by his friends, while his adversary stood at one side. 'Gentlemen,' said one of the seconds, 'you have both of you shown the greatest courage, since you were both of you ignorant of the effects of the explosion.' M. ——, the other second, then informed them that the cigars were lighted on one of the cigars; and now let us to dinner. My friend, he is the best of every duel!' The meeting is said to have taken place on the Belgian frontier."

FREEDOM will have their offspring should teach them, whether they be rich or poor, to early subject to the river and buffet the briny wave. Let eggs and bright coins glitter for them in the bottom of the lake, and reward their diving feats. While they think only of the brother and the sister, they will be gaining those sinewy muscles and health and courage, of suppleness and strength of limb. When they are grown at sea they will be calm when others tremble, knowing that they have power over the water, and the confidence which the earth's fixity gives. Let those who give the swim suppose that their education is completed. They will be the most pliable of seamen, and the most expert in boarding, getting to shore or joining their ship over the smallest hawser, and the most daring in climbing the rigging. Let them hurt, and laugh their hook-beam, and the sea is cold round his waist the rope which his comrades have thrown out to save and welcome him on board.



ANDREA FERRARA was a Spanish artist, and in the height of his celebrity. He was so appreciative, who was an excellent workman, and possessed a high spirit of emulation to perfect his skill in the exercise of so great a master. In solitude, however, was disappointed by a habitude of Andrea Bisai, whom he looked on as his rival and envied by envy, he excelled the workmen, and locked the door of the atelier while he performed some unknown operation, after which he again admitted the assistants to finish the blades which were in preparation. The common report was current that this reclusion concealed some occult process which essentially affected the perfection of his arms. Anxious to possess this important secret, upon the first absence of the master he broke into the room. He found a furnace, and at the next occasion when he and his fellows were excluded returned under the smithy, and, applying fire to the prepared orifice, discovered his master in the act of drawing a bowl full of liquid fire, in which he quenched with unpunched breath. Future laid the red steel on the anvil, which he beat into shape in a small form. The privilege, rapidly covered the glowing metal with a coat of white powder, which he then immediately fixed in a vessel until it was cold, when he again returned it to the fire, and, having given the last degree of heat, repeated the same operation of pounding and hammering on the other side of the blade. The process was then completed. Andreas upon all the weapons then in progress, until the whole being completed, he had done his best moment all turned toward the door. The artist perceived that the mystery was at an end. Avoiding to be surprised, he substituted his eyelet-hole and fled to his companions, with whom he now immediately recalled to caution their vengeance.

DEATH OF A PARISIAN NOTABILITY.—"The Armenian," as well known to all frequenters of the Bibliothèque at Paris, has died in the middle of the present year, at the estimated age of ninety years. His proper name was the Rev. Father Aucher. He was a native of Armenia, but in early life he went to Egypt, and while there Egypt in 1801. He was to be seen every day in the reading-room of the library with white hair and beard flowing, his head surmounted with a little green cap. Some years ago he was made the subject of a humorous paragraph by the Figaro, which was "got up" in exactly the style of the Abbé, and the grave learning of the Bibliothèque, without a moment's hesitation, more than the attention usually given to the Armenian. Nothing daunted, himself in a few days wrote to that individual, and was deep in the pursuit of a large folio, when the messenger were accredited with the apparent second entrance of the venerable Abbé, who was himself so astonished at the sight of his own name printed in his own seat, perusing, with his own hugs spectacles, some of his own writings. The incident gave rise to all of the attendants with as much gravity as they could muster, and the delivered monarch was restored to his unspiral throne.

SOCIAL SALAMANDERS.—Considering the amount of attention which is paid to fools, in social circles, every body help has to go through in his passage through life, it would obviously be a boon to all if we could discover the sexes of those most remarkable people who seem to pass through life without the slightest trace of intellectual power suffering a pang. The man of ordinary sensibility may secure his feelings from the effects of the ridicule or reprimand, but still the effect also in a very perceptible fashion. The man of sense, and his privilege is charged before the public, or to be humiliated in society by the folly of a fool, or a fool's choice, or in his business, his bins with a vexation which he scarcely care to unveal, but there are those who are not to be thus disturbed by the pervious to all feelings of this sort. Like Shadrach and Meshach, they are protected by a miraculous power from the usual effects of the heated furnace. When they come out—the one from the pulpit, the other from the bar—no power, nor is a heir of their head singed, nor are their coats changed, nor has the smell of fire passed on them. Instead of courting retirement, they seek as much society as possible, and, like the fish in their native element, they are happiest when they are in the midst of it. Their offenses are naturally indented to the common lot of mortals, and they are consequently the most unpardonable of this kind are too plain to need enumeration. Such a question as the above, instead of a mere theoretical one, has a practical bearing upon the choice of a husband. The fool is a fool, and the fool is a fool, and the fool is a fool, and the

REAR-ADMIRAL FRANCIS H. GREGORY.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

PRESTON KING.

We give on this page a portrait of the Honorable PRESTON KING, who from the 1st of September next will perform the duties of the Collector of the port of New York. PRESTON KING holds to-day an important relation to the politics of this country. He has been nearly all his life engaged in politics. Born at Ogdensburg, St. Lawrence County, New York, October 4, 1806, he graduated at Union College, and devoted himself to the profession of the Law. For several years he was a member of the New York Legislature; and from 1843 to 1847 he represented that State in Congress. Again, in 1849, he was elected to Congress from New York, holding his seat until 1853. He was afterward elected to the United States Senate, where he served on important committees. During the war Mr. KING'S record was clear and unmistakable. He was chosen, with HORACE GREELEY, to represent the Union party in this State in the Electoral College which re-elected President LINCOLN. Since the death of LINCOLN he has been in constant companionship with President JOHNSON, and was held to be one of the most influential of his advisers.

THE BUFORD MONUMENT.

AMONG the many beautiful monuments at the West Point Cemetery is one recently erected to the memory of Major-General JOHN BUFORD, the celebrated cavalry officer of the Army of the Potomac, who died December 16, 1863. The monument is 25 feet high above the ground. The lower base is of Maine granite, above which is the massive moulded marble base. On the front of this are sculptured two cavalry swords in bas-relief. The die is of one large solid block, upon which is the inscription.

The cap of the die is heavily moulded, and on the four corners are eagles. The shaft—a solid piece of marble—is ten feet high and two feet square. The monument was constructed by FISHER & BIRD, of New York.

General BUFORD was at the time of his death the most promising of our cavalry officers. His skill was only equaled by his marvelous coolness. His horse was always at the point of peril: he never asked his men to go, but always called to them "Come on, boys!" He was kind as he was brave; he has been seen to shield his sleeping aid-de-camp by throwing over him his own cloak, while he himself walked about to keep off the chill of the night air. It is not wonderful that with these characteristics he was so ardently loved by his men, who have raised this monument as a token of their admiration.

THE CIVIL WAR IN HAYTI.

BY JAMES REDPATH.

HAYTI was the first country in the New World to imitate the example of the United States in throwing off all political allegiance to the Old World. It is following our example again. It has a Civil War. The North and South are arrayed against each other. But, in Hayti, it is the North that is in revolt; while the South talks of "loyalty," and "union," and "sustaining the Government."

The accounts that have reached us have been vague and contradictory. But I have before me a file of the Opinion Nationale of Port-au-Prince, from which the Government version of the rebellion can be readily enough gleaned. It does not flatter the armed Opposition. It does not recognize them as patriots. It publishes none of the multitudinous manifestoes which undoubtedly have been issued at the head-quarters of "the enemy." It characterizes the leader of the rebellion, or one of them, as an assassin.

FABRE GEFFRARD, the President of Hayti, is a man of iron nerve; an eloquent orator, a statesman fully alive to the needs of his people, a friend of progress, humane, affable, polished, and tolerably well educated. He was the man of all others to succeed the ignorant and brutal barbarian SOULOUQUE. It was necessary, in order that the castes of Hayti should be united, that a mulatto, with such qualifications, should appear as ruler, to soften, if not obliterate, their mutual prejudices. For the blacks and mulattoes in Hayti have been at enmity from time immemorial. It began before slavery disappeared. The mulattoes were free, wealthy, and slaveholders. Their fathers flung treasures at them, but kept them at arm's-length. They left them estates, but would not suffer them to dine with them. They sent them to Paris to be educated, but ostracized them. This prejudice created that extraordinary feeling in the breasts of the mulatto which caused HUMBOLDT to say that they had of their father and despised their mother.

The French Revolution developed these sentiments into martial action; for the educated mulattoes demanded the political rights for themselves which the National Assembly proclaimed. The St. Domingo planters showed precisely the same spirit, which is manifested in South Carolina today. They resolutely declared that they would never share their privileges with "an inferior and bastard race." This coarse answer enraged the sensitive mulattoes, who had acted thus far precisely as our Republican party act at the beginning of our own civil war—they had never asked any right for the slave, and resented the accusation that they desired to interfere with "the domestic institution." But the logic of events, there as here, quickly called the blacks to arms; and their rebellion was promptly suppressed, at the price of the abolition of slavery. SONTHONAX, the Free Commissioner, has the sublime honor of being the first man in history to conceive and execute the idea of immediate emancipation.

It would take too much of your space to tell how, during the Revolutionary War and after, the whites disappeared, and the half-way between the blacks and the mulattoes rapidly developed itself and brought on most disastrous conflicts. It is enough to say that it was suppressed only during the vigorous administration of TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE and the brief and bloody reign of the Emperor DESSALINES; but burst out again with fresh fury in 1806, when the founder of Haytian nationality fell dead beneath the dagger of a band of assassins—one of them the grandfather of President GEFFRARD. He had become a very cruel and remorseless despot.

At his death CHRISTOPHE, a black, became King of the North, and PETION, a mulatto, President of the South. CHRISTOPHE was the PETER THE GREAT of Hayti—a wonderful man, but a ferocious tyrant. PETION was more like our MADISON—he was calculated for an era of good feeling than stormy times. This territorial division existed until the death of PETION and the suicide of CHRISTOPHE, in 1820, when not the North only, but the Spanish part also, were united under President BOYER, who held sway for twenty-five years. He was a mulatto, and favored his caste. After four Presidencies of one year each SOULOUQUE succeeded to the supreme power, and established a black man's Government; but, unfortunately, he represented the bar sinister rather than the good qualities of the race. He was overthrown on the 22d of December, 1858, by President GEFFRARD.

GEFFRARD set to work in the right spirit to reform all abuses. He reduced the army and reorganized it; he encouraged education, and established, for the first time, a school for girls; he appealed to the Pope for decent priests, who would have a very great novelty in Hayti; he tried to remodel the courts and to reform the Executive; he urged the sanctity of marriage to the country folks; he did his best to abolish the prejudices of the two great classes of his countrymen, and to invite a large emigration. He did a great deal of good. But he lack d firmness—he did not dare; he was a gentle conciliator—not an unyielding reformer; he had in me faith in persuasion when authority was wanted. Long ago—in 1860—I predicted that his work would be accomplished in a few years, and that the situation would demand as his successor a bold black man, inspired with the spirit of progress, to drive the country ahead. That reformer must be a pure negro, because he alone could command the confidence of the blacks, who would not tolerate the semi-tigerous rule from a mulatto that they would applaud in one of their own color.

There have been several attempts to overthrow GEFFRARD, most of them from the Soulouque faction—the barbarous element. But each one was one effort to inaugurate a revolution originated by the enlightened class; and when it was recorded that MR. DUVAL and MR. ANDRE GERMAINE had been imprisoned as conspirators I believed what I had only feared before, that the love of office and the poisonous lips of flatterers had made the good GEFFRARD false to his great mission.

I read now that GEFFRARD has released ANDRE GERMAINE, but I hear also that the Revolutionists are gaining ground. If HORACE GREELEY or MR. SUMNER had been imprisoned for conspiracy, and released only when a revolution was rapidly increasing in strength, we would rejoice at the fact, but we would hardly thank the Government. The celebrated sentence would leap to the lips of the hearer. "C'est un tort!"

On the 10th of May last the President of Hayti

issued an Order of the Day, two Decrees (Arrêtés), and a Proclamation to the People—in all of which it was announced that a condemned criminal, named Tirès Salnave, had "fomented a sedition" in the North. The Proclamation bears the marks of Geffrard's own style, and therefore I translate it, as a statement of his view of the insurrection:

PROCLAMATION.

Fassie Geffrard, President of Hayti.

Haytians!—A sedition, fomented on Dominican territory by a band of fugitives, outcasts, and assassins, on the 7th of May instant, the town of Ouanaminthe, whose commandant I installed. This band threatened to invade the neighboring localities, and to throw them into anarchy. Its criminal enterprises and infamous projects I defeated in easy to divine: it is the satisfaction of odious ambitions, of blind rancors, of the most—ha! it is horrible to say—Expiration that the innocuous dream of. Their chief: it is the said Tirès Salnave, condemned by contumacy, hardly eight months ago, by the verdict of the Court Martial of Cape Haytien, for the penalty of death for attempt and assassination.

Haytians! In these circumstances I need only say to you, Remain faithful to the Government of the 22d of December, to the head of which I have been called by the unanimity of your suffrages. I call you to the defense of the immortal integrity of your territory; I call you to the defense of your Republican institutions: I call you, in brief, to play your chiefs in order, at any cost, to maintain this Union which was the strength of your fathers, and on which should rest your future, our independence, our nationality!

The civic and the bitter trial which have been imposed on the inhabitants of the Eastern Part, are not they a lesson? Will you not profit by them? Will you abandon the flag of the Union, the flag under which your fathers fought, to the ruin and the misery of an unknown future, under the guidance of a man condemned for assassination?

No! You will not hesitate; you will not sacrifice the welfare and the destinies of your country; you will never permit yourselves to be led into a path at the end of which there are but ruins and disasters.

Citizens! the Government will not fail under the new trials which are preparing for it. I engage on it, therefore in its patriotism. The most energetic measures will be taken to crush out this rebellion and to maintain public tranquillity.

Soldiers! your fidelity and your loyalty are known to me: these sentiments, I am certain of it, will be as great as the pride which animates the country.

Citizens and Soldiers! let us express the unanimity of our sentiments in the following watchwords:

Long live the Republic, one and indivisible!

Long live the Constitution!

Done at the National Palaces, at Port-au-Prince, May 10, 1865, the seventy-second year of Independence.

Geffrard.

The Order of the Day decreed that each Haytian Dominican found on Haytian territory should be regarded as a foreign enemy and shot. The Decrees outlawed Salnave and every rebel soldier who should aid him, directly or indirectly; and authorized any citizen to "à lui courir sus!" which means, in homely English, to hunt him as he would the cat. Further put the Department of the North under martial law.

On the 15th and 17th of May Geffrard issued two additional Orders of the Day, which are so characteristic of Haytian military or revolutionary literature that I will give them, also, without abridgment:

Fassie Geffrard, President of Hayti.

To the National Guards of the Republic:

National Guards! The National unity is menaced! The Union of the Haytian people—the only source of security in danger! A handful of factionists insulted together at Cape Haytien, under the leadership of the perfidious and treacherous General, François Jean Jeune (sic Portrait), and of Tirès Salnave, the murderer of Colonel Philippeaux, have raised the flag of civil war, have declared that Northern People separate and withdraw from the legitimate Government of the Republic.

The insurrection is circumscribed in the North: Gonaïves, St. Mark, and the populations of the Artibonite herald its faith in the National flag.

I call you to rally to sustain the army for the defense of that which is your own—the inviolable soil of your territory, our independence, and our nationality!

Let us not submit to a handful of rebels to impose on you and to the opinion of a King of Europe, who has taken the side of the Republic of Hayti, and who has manifested to her that they may impose on you involuntary labor, and profit by your weak to wretch themselves, as under the old King Christophe.

Our father did not wish you to bear the shame of this réclame.

Let us imitate their example; let us remain united. Let us fight the hydra of anarchy; let us defend our revolutionary institutions!

Gather, then, from all parts of the Republic; range yourselves around your chiefs and under your flag!

May the unanimity of your sentiments prove to our enemies our invincible resolution to oppose them than to suffer any dishonor, from whatever part it come to us!

National Guards of the Republic! it belongs to you to set the example of fidelity and loyalty. I have confidence in you, and I count upon you.

Long live the National Unity!—Long live the Constitution!—Long live Liberty!

Done, etc., etc. Geffrard.

The next Order was addressed

To the Generals in command and to the Officers of all grades of the Department of the North:

Officers! The General-in-Chief-in, President of Hayti, the chief whom you spontaneously acclaimed on the 22d of December, 1858, has just come finally to the end of his endurance, in the face of God and of the glorious National flag, and who has just come to the help of the Republic—Long live your welfare and the country!

In this critical moments, in which the country makes an appeal to all its children to preserve it from the great evils which threaten it, the handful of traitors, of perjurers, of factionists threaten it—before the blood shed at Fallhorse cries and to the vengeance against the crime which before Haytian blood is poured out here, I appeal, for the last time, to your honor and to your loyalty. Return, then, to return, to range yourselves under the flag of the Republic, to reveal the sentiments of the legitimate Government. Geffrard.

You will be welcomed with joy there, and at brothers who, for a moment fallen and misled, return to reason and to honor.

Listen to the voice of your conscience, the voice of honor, and of duty and of love!

Listen! Throw down the fratricidal arms that are in your hands, and range your swords for the defense of the country, shouting "Long live the Union!

"Long live the Republic, one and indivisible!"

Done at the National Palaces, etc. Geffrard.

Whatever the pretenses of the rebels may be, the name of their leader, François Jean Jeune, and the omission of the word Equality from the National device, stamps the "secessionist movement" (sic the Opinion Nationale terms it) as a revival of barbarian against civilization. I send you a portrait of Jeune, which he presented to me a few years ago, as a token of his regard for my "sentiments philanthropiques!" He was a General at Cape Haytien under the Emperor Soulouque, and was the first to declare in favor of Geffrard. He is a pure black—a man of great brutal force, of barbarous energy; and all his instincts are antagonistic to liberal ideas and a high civilization. He was made a member of Geffrard's Cabinet, as Minister of the Interior, and he might then have been seen at his Bureau any day in a faultless uniform, basking himself on the lalustrade; while behind him, in the room, toiling at his desk, sat the real Secretary—the intelligent and industrious Auguste Elie. Geffrard's duty as Minister was to sign the papers that Mons. Elie brought to him. He was simply a figure-head. Jeune is a man of ferocious, fine blacks. There was another pure negro in Geffrard's Cabinet, but he was a man of real force—Lamothe, who is now dead, and who, I fear, will be the escape from condemnation for conspiracy.

This revolt is simply an insurrection of the Soulouque party—of the pure Dominican blacks, against the mulattoes, or the Geffrard party; and all our sympathies and wishes should go with the legitimate Government.

Perhaps the objection that the friends of Hayti have against Geffrard may be made more intelligible by saying that they regard him as the McClellan of Hayti, while the times call out for a Grant. The country needs a man who can push on and hold on, and dare and dare and always dare; while Geffrard, it has been seen, has contented himself with a few feeble and timorous advances against the spiritual Richmond of his people. He lacks audacity. But as between McClellan and Mr. Lincoln, or the Abby Prince, no Northern man would have hesitated a moment, so the Haytian friends of Geffrard and Jean Jeune and his horde of semi-barbarians we "shout," with "the order of the day" just quoted, "Long live the Republic, one and indivisible!"

Joseph's design is to make "the North"—Christophe's kingdom—an independent, retrogressive, black State. Geffrard is the head of the progressive party of Hayti seek is to unite the whole island under one intelligent Government.

It is the duty of N. Hepburn, the Wendell Phillips of the Negro Republic:

We are in the midst of events which only affect all the interests of the world, but the principles of life, the future the prosperity, the fair fame of our nationality. Instead of uniting ourselves in the presence of the enemy in our power, to effect the interior improvements which our society need, but by an incredible fatality we have to understand, hard to excess, forgetting the holy ties of fraternity which unite all the children of the soil, we are ready to run against each other, we are preparing to rush into combat. Why? How do I say? Go to fight between ourselves? The strife has commenced! Blood has flowed. . . . Citizens of the North, Artibonite, Gonaïves, the interests of the country, the interests of our race, demand that we should remain united. All the divisions among ourselves will but colosthe and finally compromise our nationality. Our country, our nationality, our security, not sufficiently peopled, in order to maintain unity ought not to stray from any one of them. The Republic must remain one and indivisible. To the end that liberal and progressive ideas may receive every day a more decided development, and enable us to secure the prosperity of our Republic, the Republic, the unity of our citizenship—it is of the first necessity that we put a stop to conspiracies and revolutions. Succession has been a curse, it is, at any country, been favorable to a good fructification of liberal ideas. The final consolidation of Haytian nationalities has always been to obliterate the moral sense of the people, to corrupt the public conscience, to stifle, in fine, to tyranny. . . . In the actual state of the Republic, we say, in the interest of liberty, of the dignity of man, to whatever party they belong, in to gather around the head of the Republic, around the flag of the Union, the secessionist movement which is making us the object of contempt of the world. The public Ideal which we pursue it is not, certainly, liberty, civilization, but restoration. Union of the blacks and the people of color, dominated by the guarantees of continued prosperity, of peace, of security, of liberty, such is the ideal we offer to our brethren in the East.

I had intended to give a record of the rebellion in Hayti, but I find that it would read, after our Titanic strife, as a caricature, or but needlessly recall that strange period of history, when all was quiet along the Potomac. There have been skirmishes in Hayti, in which a few persons—a very few—have killed or wounded; but why chronicle such small deeds in the land where Grant and Sherman have hardly yet washed themselves of the blood of battle?

The last news is that the rebels still hold the North, but that the Government is active and that Geffrard has been worsted in every engagement, and has been advised to resign. That is to say, the Haytian intelligence is in sympathy with everything in and from Hayti is and has always been during my recollection. The official news, of course, is favorable to the Government, and we have no means of obtaining the rebel version of the situation. But a private letter contains this intelligence:

The government troops have been worsted in almost every encounter, and are rapidly deserting to the insurgents. The Haytian Government is now making its way in Dominica fighting against Spain. He was under ominous circumstances. He is now in the hands of the Commissioner of Cape Haytien with about five hundred Dominicans and a few Haytians. The Spanish Consul at Cape Haytien has received upward of a thousand Dominicans more, and has declared himself ready to receive any others who have been badly stripped, and a great many deserted, one night, from the ranks of the Haytian Government.

Salnave has also succeeded in enlisting a considerable number of Haytians in his cause, and has gone with them to Gonaïves, where he has declared himself President, and has issued his proclamation, and has sent out his aid and home nearly into mine-mast.

I am informed Geffrard has been advised to leave as soon as possible, as his troops are not to be relied upon, and because the strong party who have espoused as that they get their pay. Salnave pays his soldiers twenty-five gourds a month, and promises them land as a subsistence. Geffrard pays four gourds a month, and four gourds a day for rations—that is, when he can get words about seven American cents. The result is easily seen. Foreigners have always been well treated in Haytian revolutions.

Salnave, the present Minister of Public Instruction, will probably be elected by the Senate as President, should Salnave succeed. Under the new order of things greater privileges are promised to whites, a treaty of commerce will be made with Dominica, and improvements receive liberal encouragement.

This letter was dated Port-au-Prince, June 26, and it appears that Salnave was then in possession of no official war bulletin. It is possible, therefore, that Geffrard may be compelled to abdicate.

Daniel Fanshaw & Co., Dominica block. He is not a man of remarkable energy, but I think he is a man of good heart. He talks English fluently. He was Haytian embassador at the court of St. James when the James Buchanan was the American plenipotentiary there. Three incidents are told in Hayti of these two representatives of the American republics. The old gray-haired public functionary twice evaded a recognition of equality—once by staying away from a banquet when the Haytian embassador was ticketed to be placed next to him; and once, on being introduced, by dropping a handkerchief and stooping to pick it up instead of shaking hands. Some one also asked the O. G. H. P. F. what he thought of the Haytian embassador. "I think," said he, that he would be worth $1500 in New Orleans."

If Geffrard falls, and is succeded by Jeune, it will be a triumph of barbarism; if he succeeds by Damier, it will be but a change of Administration—for the Minister of Instruction is a friend of progress. But if no change occurs, let us hope that Geffrard will learn these lessons from the insurrection: That barbarism is not a thing to be conciliated or bribed, but to be crushed under and exterminated; and that, whatever flattering lips in the Northern States of Port-au-Prince may say, there is no lasting renown to be gained by benevolent views and able rhetoric merely, but only by a wise and iron-willed and fearless statesmanship.

The Game of Bézique
COMPLETE.

PUBLISHED BY OLNEY & PRATT,
No. 41 John Street, New York.

Of all Card games ever invented this one is perhaps the most interesting, if it is not the most scientific. It is especially a card game for the family circle, and familiar gathering of friends, calling out at once the interest, skill, and social nature of its players. As a card game among Indies, it has proved in their estimation the favorite. The game was originated in the brilliant Court of Louis XIV. during the last part of the Sixteenth Century in Dolchino—and the term Bolchino has a personal signification relative to a singular marriage, which occurred at that time, of a lady of the highest rank and great beauty, to a Duke named Bolchino, who was an extremely ill-favored, though ill-accounted so, and appears quite likely when we consider that the Duke was represented Dolchino as the original name. Its origin is ascribed to other source; but we give the above as the one which appears to us most reliable to gather that gives any explanation of the word Bézique. This game has been revived in the last few years among the French, with some alterations and additions, and has become a favorite card amusement in the fashionable circles of Paris life. In the mean time it has been introduced to the United States, and from the interest it is played only by the few in the higher circles of society, it is rapidly making its popularity with all.

MACHINE.
The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity.

Patented May 13, 1862. Improvements Patented June 9, 1863. The unrivaled FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most wonderful and elegant piece of mechanism! Sews by the lock stitch—alike on both sides—will not ravel, sews with needle or thread of any size, will run backward or forward at pleasure, and is capable of a great variety of work. Will gather, stitch, hem, fell, bind, braid, cord, tuck, quilt, &c.; requires no basting or change of stitch; is not liable to get out of order or cannot, and will last a lifetime.

"For the dressmaker it is invaluable; for the household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Ladies' Book.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine will be prosecuted for infringement of the patents. Single machines sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed directions, on receipt of the price, $5. Agents wanted every where. Circular, containing liberal inducements, sent free.

All orders must be addressed to the

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL SHERMAN AND HIS CAMPAIGNS.

BY

COL. S. M. BOWMAN AND LIEUT.-COL. R. B. IRWIN.

1 vol., 8vo, 500 pages, Cloth, $2 50.

With Eight Splendid Steel Portraits, and Maps, &c.

This work—written by Col. Bowman, Gen. Sherman's personal friend, and Lieut.-Col. Irwin, one of our ablest military writers—is the complete official history of this grand army as a whole and in all its details. Every Corps, Division, Brigade, and Regiment is awarded its full share of credit and praise; the routes of march are carefully described, and all the great skirmishes are described with the vividness of actual participation, and the whole marvelous campaign is given in a connected story as simple and truthful, that were an inevitable accompaniment of such campaigns.

No other Official and Authentic History of this Great Army will be Published; for no other writers can have access to the private and official papers of the several commanders, from whose information is furnished for this work exclusively.

HEADQUARTERS, MIL. DIV. MISS., July 21, 1865.

C. B. Richardson, Esq., 540 Broadway, New York:

SIR,—Col. R. B. Irwin, on requisition of the same since 1853, and more recently in the service of the United States, has had access to my letter and Letter Books, embracing copies of all orders made and letters written by me since the winter of 1863, in the field, to which is added many of my life and services, and no other person has had such an opportunity to refer to original thoughts and acts. I believe him to be in possession of all authentic facts that can illustrate the period of time, &c., &c.

Yours, &c., W. T. SHERMAN, Major-General.

The volume is illustrated with eight splendid STEEL PORTRAITS of Major-Generals SHERMAN, SCHOFIELD, HOWARD, THOMAS, HOOKER, LOGAN, BLAIR, and RAWLINS, and with carefully prepared Maps and Diagrams, furnished for every battle. The Table of Contents of the work is particularly engraved on stone.

To all who are interested in any capacity in these brilliant campaigns the work will be invaluable; while to all who have had relatives or friends so engaged it will be a most absorbing interest and value. It is a record of brilliant achievements, in every of which all will be a life-long pride.

THE WORK IS SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

Attention, Battallion!
We have just issued a MAGNIFICENT SOLDIERS CERTIFICATE,
setting in fine gilt lines, upon white and tinted paper, in the highest style of lithographic art. While it gives a beautiful and life-like representation of the scene of War, a prominent feature is an elegantly-curved frame to contain the Soldier's Photograph, and a Love Motto with ornamental [illegible] space to be inscribed with the names of the [illegible] in which he or she is engaged.
A spl mdid engraved certificate of military service, to be signed by commanding officers, renders the whole a valuable memento of the late bloody rebellion to transmit to your child on whom will regard it precisely as a priceless gift. WHITEFIELD PREACHING IN MOORFIELDS.

THE illustration on page 572 is copied from a painting by Mr. CROWE, a young English artist, who has now taken a distinguished place as a historical painter. No better explanation can be given of the situation chosen by the artist than the following quotation from PHILIPS'S "Life and Times of WHITEFIELD:" "The merry-andrew—attended by others, who complained that they had taken many pounds less that day on account of my preaching—got up upon a man's shoulders; and, advancing, attempted to slash me with a long, heavy whip several times, but always, with the violence of his motion, tumbled down. They got a recruiting-sergeant with his drum to pass through the congregation. . . Others, having got a large pole for their standard, advanced from the opposite side with steady and formidable steps; but just as they approached us they quarreled among themselves, threw down their staff, and went their way. . . . My pockets were full of notes from persons who sought under concern. Boys and girls who were fond of sitting round me while I preached handed me these people's notes, though often pelted with eggs, dirt, etc., and they never once gave way."

The picture so closely illustrates this passage that to offer further merely descriptive remarks would be entirely supererogatory. All the incidents of the quotation are given, or suggested as likely to follow, together with some others which the reader can not fail to observe for himself. We may add, however, that WHITEFIELD says that the scene described in the quotation occurred on a Whit-Monday. "For many years, from one end of Moorfields to the other, booths of all kinds had been erected for mountebanks, players, puppet-shows, and such like." At such a resort for amusement the concourse on the most popular holiday of the year would, of course, be enormous. WHITEFIELD estimates that there could not have been less than twenty or thirty thousand people present. Three times did he preach to them during the day; the incidents of the picture occurring during his third sermon in the evening. It will be remembered that the Moorfields district was often the scene of the missionary labors of WHITEFIELD'S contemporary revivalist WESLEY, that similar persecution from the mob attended his preaching, and that still more permanent and wide-spread results have followed his ministry. These two remarkable men began their apostolic labors in concert, but disagreed on doctrinal points, WHITEFIELD adopting Calvinism and WESLEY Arminianism. Moorfields, where WHITEFIELD preached, is now far within the limits of London. But though Moorfields is changed the power of WHITEFIELD'S bold and almost inspired utterances still remains and works among men. WHITEFIELD and WESLEY commenced the work—but the end is beyond human contemplation in its grandeur and extent. The Episcopal Church of England owes its purity from the corruptions which beholded it in their day very much to their influence and that of their disciples. It was demonstrated once and forever by these men that the gospel belongs to the poor and the weak and the lowly as well as to the rich and the intellectual. They taught that Christianity might exist apart from the formularies of churchmen, and without the prestige of Apostolic descent. They did in their time for the Church what Luther did in his: they protested against mechanical faith, which manifests itself in elaborate devices and made an evil hypocrisy, and against that error, which killeth, to the Spirit, which maketh alive. Like the reformers of Luther's time, they were persecuted and reviled, until their work assumed its true proportions and relations in the eyes of men, when they commanded the most profound respect even of the learned and the aristocratic.

"IN THE WOODS."—[FROM A PAINTING BY W. F. C. DOBSON.]

POLITICAL PROSPECTS.

HOW shall we vote in the autumn elections? Every honest man will ask himself this question, and he will answer it by determining to which party, in so important a matter, attaches as this, political power ought to be intrusted. For although no issue is as yet distinctly made, in a very grave one soon will be, that of reorganization—and he must look to the antecedents and composition of parties to infer what their probable action will be.

The Union party comprises the great body of enlightened American citizens who have always faithfully striven for greater justice, for universal liberty regulated by law, and for the freedom of speech and the press every where in the country. They have unhesitatingly asserted the rights of the whole people against any party and aristocracy in every form, and have claimed fair play for all men, rich or poor, foreigner or native, whatever their complexion and condition, and to that end have been constantly anxious for popular education and every method of enlightenment. They hold that the Constitution is not a compact between sovereign governments, but is a fundamental national law established by the people of the United States; and that the Union is not a confederation but a nation. They believe that this National Government is supreme, that the States are properly subordinated to it, and that State rights are purely local and secondary. Therefore they have been steadily faithful in the great and successful struggle. They have never tampered with rebellion. They have never sought to reason nor excused traitors; and in the deathgrapple with rebellion they have wisely used every power of the Government, conscious that all extraordinary powers were exercised by magistrates under the immediate supervision of the people, and whose acts merely recorded the popular will, as the election of 1864 triumphantly proved.

This is the faith, and these are the men who compose the great Union party. Who they forfeited the confidence of the country?

On the other hand, the Democratic party is composed of those who have always excused the most appalling crime against human rights, and the most fatal treason to the American principle of equal rights, under the pretense of State rights, and persistently contended that the extension and perpetuity of that injustice which has soaked the land in blood and necessitated the debt. They have been the assailants of free speech and free press, and have defended the murder and maltreatment of citizens who claimed to exercise those rights in the Southern States. Their influence has been adverse to general education and wise progress and reform; and their predominance has been and is always disastrous. And among the most debased part of the population, and in the least intelligent portions of the country. Even now their Conventions, vaguely as in Maine, distinctly and openly as in Ohio, reaffirm the principles of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of '98, which are and always have been pleaded by the rebels as justification, as they were by South Carolina for nullification in 1833, and which will always afford an excuse for treason until they are utterly and expressly overthrown; or, as in Pennsylvania, their Conventions deliberately declare that the practical recognition of the truths of the Declaration of Independence is a high crime against the Constitution of the United States. They are those from whose ranks came the chiefs of the rebellion; who denounced the principle of the loyal leagues as really responsible for the war; who incessantly thwarted the Government in its efforts to subdue it; who incited riots and directed mobs; for whose support at the polls the rebel chiefs and editors openly prayed in the midst of the war; who solicited through a foreign Minister foreign interference in our contest; who a year ago, in their National Convention, declared the soldiers conquered and the war a failure, and who nominated as President Lincoln as helplessly weak, or denounced him as a murderer, tyrant, and harlequin.

These are they who compose the Democratic party. They are now busily engaged in praising the soldiers, whom last year they slandered, and in celebrating the re-establishment of the Union. They are even engaged in the pleasing process of eating the Chicago platform. But what has this party, in whose Ohio Convention VALLANDIGHAM was a leader, and in whose Pennsylvania Convention Judge BLACK was an applauded teacher, who said, as Buchanan's Chief-Governor, that the people would legalize secession and dissolve the Union—what has this party done to be intrusted with power by the American people who condemned it overwhelmingly last November? We speak of a party, not of individuals. We do not forget with what absolute sacrifice, with what blood and money, and with success, it was cursed by the country. But neither do we forget that as a party the Democrats voted against emancipation, and that in the States which they controlled the amendment was defeated. We do not forget that if the Democratic party had retained power in 1860 they would have compromised the basis of the country without permanently avoiding the war; and we remember, nor will the American people soon forget, that in 1862 they solemnly proposed acquiescence in national disgrace and ruin.

These are the two parties who now solicit your votes. Of every one who loves a Union unobscured by "the resolutions of '98," who loves his country and believes that equal rights for all men before the law are essential to her permanent peace and prosperity, ask himself which of these parties ought to have his vote.

THE PRISON-PEN AT ANDERSONVILLE.

THE new correspondent of the London Times in this country has evidently been where we are much reason to believe the revolting stories of the Andersonville tortures. Thereupon Colonel RICHARD MURRAY, an English colonel who for some time in the rebel army, and afterward published a book upon the war, wrote that he had heard and seen nothing of the kind, and did not believe the story. The innocence of the Colonel is like that of Miss MURRAY, the Queen's companion, and other ladies who travel in the South. Miss MURRAY in the early days when people were driven out of those States and lynched and ridden on rails for doubting the entangled alliance and the cause. The good ladies were passed softly along from parlor to parlor, and were carefully prevented from seeing the hopeless misery which MRS. MCRAEL, the widow of a Union officer, describes, and saw only the high-bred smile of contempt at the idea of suffering among "the people," or at the severest. Like Colonel MURRAY they did not see prisoners starving and literally rotting. He did not hear, in the select society of Richmond, that captive Yankees were tortured by design. The "chivalric Southern gentlemen" in the head-quarters of General LEE did not allude to the nuisance pen at Andersonville and Salisbury and Millen. Of course, therefore, the stories were vile Yankee lies.

The innocent Colonel FREEMANTLE and the rest of the gentlemanly rebel men in this country letter of HENRY WIRZ, who kept the pen, and who probably knows more of the truth than young gentlemen upon General LEE's staff, or young women in Richmond drawing-rooms. On the 7th of May, after the surrender of LEE and JOHNSTON, when it was plain that the rebellion was hopeless, he wrote to General WILSON, commanding at Macon. He says in his letter: "The duties I had to perform were arduous and unpleasant." I am satisfied that no man can or will unjustly blame me for the things that happened here, and which were beyond my power to control. I do not think I ought to be held responsible for the absence of rations; for the overcrowded state of the prison, which was in itself a prolific source of the fearful mortality; for the adequate supplies of clothing, want of shelter, etc., etc."

This is the fullest confession by the keeper of the Andersonville pen of all the horrors that were ever charged upon him. He admits that the prisoners were starved; that they were naked and shelterless; that they were so closely packed as to die standing; and he adds the "et cetera, et cetera!" He states it naturally as gently as possible, and this is his statement. The sickening details, with which we are all familiar, are not more appalling than this summary. WIRZ concludes by saying that his life is in danger from those who suffered, and who wrongfully hold him responsible. He was only "the tool in the hands of my superiors;" and he asks General WILSON for a guard to preserve him and his family from violence until he can escape to Europe.

DR. JOHN C. BATES, a surgeon in the rebel service, detailed for duty at Andersonville, was "utterly shocked" upon arriving in the hospital, to find the sick prisoners "lying, partially naked, dirty, and lousy, in the sand: others were crowded together in small tents, the latter unserviceable at the best." The patients "would gather round me and ask for a bone. Of clothing we had none. The living were supplied with the clothing of those who died. There was a prolific crop of vermin and lice. ..... I found the men, as a general thing, naked, sick, and diseased. Their disposition was only to get something to eat." DR. BATES was not well chosen for the service. Humanity was not utterly extinguished in that breast. He reported the actual condition of the hospital. "Being a novice, for some of the things I said I received a written reprimand." In his charge there was a boy of fifteen or sixteen years of age. He had the scurvy and gangrene. He begged DR. BATES to bring him a potato or a biscuit. The Doctor smuggled them to him in his pocket. But the boy became more and more emaciated; his sores gangrened, and he died from lice and for want of food. "The effects from the hospital was very offensive," testifies the Doctor. The sick prisoners were confined "like sardines in a box." "I feel safe in saying seventy-five per cent. of those who died might have been saved had they been properly cared for."

Meanwhile "Colonel FREEMANTLE of the Guards" airily writes that the stories of illtreatment are all common and slander.

WIRZ was first confined in the military prison at Washington, but after conferences with ROBERT EDMUND LEE and JAMES A. SEDDON in a conspiracy to destroy the prisoners. Then the names of LEE and SEDDON were dropped. It was alleged that General GRANT requested that they should be omitted. But we are informed by WIRZ'S counsel it was done because if WIRZ were convicted there could be no excuse for suffering LEE and SEDDON to escape.

Undoubtedly it could not be proved that DAVIS or LEE issued direct orders that Union prisoners should be starved to death. But they knew that in the Andersonville pen there were thirty thousand of them collected, and that there was a universal rumor of their horrible treatment. It was no wretched detail with which they could not encumber themselves. It was the case in which a general rumor created a sacred duty of inquiry and remedy. Did ROBERT E. LEE ever make that inquiry? Is it possible that it should be made? If in the interior of Minnesota MR. STANTON had ordered a stockade to be built for the passing rebel prisoners, if they had been confined there by scores of thousands; if the rebel States had been thrilled by stories of the tortures inflicted and ample reports based upon the testimony of released sufferers and spectators had been published and disseminated, and half of the country rung with a cry of indignation, and if, under the circumstances neither President LINCOLN, nor Secretary STANTON, nor General GRANT had deigned to inquire, and all the while the frightful tales were true, then those cities of Minnesota would be justly execrated by all honorable and humane men.

This is the precise case with DAVIS, SEDDON, and LEE. Their counsel can acquit them of the moral guilt of the crimes against humanity perpetrated in those prisons. We naturally recoil from believing charges like these, who have been accounted honorable, who have sat with us at table, with whom we have shared all social amenities, and who have filled responsible public positions. But we truly accomplices of men like WIRZ in crimes so revolting. But we have yet to learn that the spirit of caste which militates against rebel men in this country and in this age to acquiesce in human slavery and defend it, involves a contempt for human nature which barbarizes and degrades men beyond belief.

MILITARY OCCUPATION.

ALTHOUGH it will be a long time before the military force of the United States can be altogether removed from the unorganized States, yet it is very essential that its presence there should be subordinated to the civil power as fast as a truly loyal civil power is established. This precedent would seem to be the relation which exists between the two authorities in the territories of the United States. There is always military force enough there to second the civil arm in maintaining order, which, in a normal state of affairs, is properly the military function.

In the present condition of the unorganized States, however, when there is no authority of any kind but that of the United States, and when the Provisional Governors are appointed not to govern the State, but to take steps to prove whether the State is sufficiently pacified safely to establish a civil government, the case is different. The military Governor is the chief officer charged with public order, and he governs by military authority. If the former practice and present prejudice of the State lead to palpable injustice, it is his duty to apply a summary remedy.

This course has been instituted in which the testimony of colored witnesses is taken and respected. And wherever a plain offense is brought to the notice of an upright and fearless military officer he will, under military rules, undoubtedly correct it, and in the speediest way. Military processes are direct and effective. To military force the law's delay is unknown.

And from this very fact springs an obvious danger. The efficiency of military justice is fascinating—but the law's delay in the long-run better secures justice. Military rule is despotic rule. It is often inevitable and necessary. It is better than anarchy. It is a rising step from anarchy to tranquil order. But the effort should constantly be to dispense with it, and to prevent the development of a taste for it. Thus, while in the unorganized States it is impossible immediately to establish a civil order, it is very important that the military authority should be reasonably and steadily, not whimsically, enforced. Then all experiments for a safe restoration of normal condition should be honestly tried, as they are now to be tried. If, for instance, the citizens who have been in insurrection against the government of the whole people, show by the spirit of their deliberations and by the character of the laws they propose, that the people can, with a proper regard for the security of the whole, intrust them to resume their local Government, the military rule can be rapidly relaxed. If, on the other hand, they explicitly show that they are not to be safely trusted, the military rule will be continued. The essential point is not State rights but National rights: not State sovereignty but National sovereignty: not a local authority but the security of the government of the people.

It is not the fault of the loyal people of the country if a subjugation or the military presence in the unorganized States becomes necessary. They proffer the opportunity of a truly loyal and honorable reorganization. If the inhabitants to whom the offer is made decline, those inhabitants are responsible. It will then be for the country to determine whether it will still maintain its military system in the applicable peril and expense, or whether it will establish civil order upon the basis of the whole free population.

CIVIC JEALOUSY.

THE city of Boston is quite as orderly, patriotic, intelligent, and moral as any city of the same size in the country. The State of Massachusetts, indeed, in the economical comfort, intelligence, and good conduct does not compare unfavorably with its sister States. The inhabitants of Massachusetts and the citizens of Boston, so far as we know, have not forfeited the common rights of the American people. But no sooner do they assemble in open public convention, and after a careful consultation express their views upon public affairs, than a cry is raised elsewhere as if such a braneh-ed faction of legendary foreigners were hitherto unheard of in history.

That the opinions of American citizens are valuable according to the part of the country in which they live is a rather foolish supposition. But if it is to be made, and adopted as a principle of the politic estimate of the weight of counsel, Massachusetts and Boston will probably not shrink from the test. If that part of the country which has furnished the deepest and most truly American influences in the development of national character is to be most carefully heeded, the claims of New England will probably not yield to those of any part of the country. Intelligence and moral force are tolerably sure influences. We do not remember that Florida or South Carolina were ever marked with an overbearing morality, or accused of moulding the mind of the country. Dwarfs are not accused of supercilious height.

The people of New England, and among them the citizens of Boston, take the liberty of holding and expressing their opinions upon public questions. They do so temperately and with dignity. They address themselves, if they think fit, to their fellow-citizens of the country or to the Chief Magistrate; and they do so with perfect respect. Such expressions do not justify themselves to the country the country will not agree with them. If they fail to satisfy the Administration they will not shape its policy. But the citizen, or city, or section should evince impatience of another for doing his plain duty is supremely silly. The Executive naturally and necessarily wishes to know the tendency of public opinion; he wishes to take counsel with the people whose views he esteems. If the people of Iowa and of the Northwest, or those of Maryland and the Middle States, of Georgia and the Southern States, of Massachusetts and the New England States were to say, they will honestly express the views they honestly hold.

As for comparative values, as we said, that is a matter not to be decided by the law but by intrinsic weight. The city of New York is a large and imposing seat of trade. But its voice in great public questions is not very decisive. No other city would have been insulted by such a person as FERNANDO WOOD with a proposition to secede. In February, 1861, the city of New York would undoubtedly have voted for the Montgomery Constitution by a large majority. In 1864 it voted against the overwhelming voice of the American people. The truth is, that the city of New York is too full of the most ignorant foreigners to be a representative American community. The great ideas that lead American civilization neither spring from the city of New York, nor are they favored there. Suppose the men whom the city sends to the State Legislature are politicians, or the people whom the city elects to the mayoralty and Common Council, should permanently control the Governments of the State and country. Our history would end in utter shame and disgrace.

By all means let New York express its opinion with the rest. It is the right of its citizens. But let us all carefully remember that one is our greatness; and that we are a metropolis, as the most populous, not as the most truly American city.

A DEFUNCT INSTITUTION.

THANK God, the Evening Exchange is a thing of the past! That pestilent institution, which was the source of so much gambling, beguiled so many men from their homes to spend their nights in dealing in gold and stocks, unsettled so many minds, and led directly to so many defalcations, frauds, failures, forgeries, and other casualties, is numbered among the dead. The Stock Exchange has unanimously agreed to suspend any member who attends the Evening Exchange, or gives credit to one who is cuted there, and by very large majorities a like resolution has been adopted by the open Board of Brokers and by the Gold Room.

The Evening Exchange was a natural outgrowth of the war and of the paper-money era. The day was not long enough for speculators who saw fit to once realized in a single afternoon by a lucky operator. Avarice stretched its skinny fingers for forward into the night. Nor could operators spend their evenings with their families at home when the telegraph was hourly bearing tidings of events which boded ruin or fortune. Many a time during the last four years the most important news of the day was received after six in the evening, when offices were closed, and Wall Street was as quiet and dull as Persepolis. Such a state was because a fall or a rise of ten per cent. in gold, and a scarcely less violent fluctuation in stocks. It was natural that the thousand operators who in both should desire to act at once, and not wait for further developments on the morrow. Some months since, before the surrender of Richmond, an attempt was made to get up the Evening Exchange. It met with no response among the very men who have now almost unanimously placed the institution under the ban. So long as the telegraph was altering values at every hour of the day and night, speculation sat up with it and refused to be put to bed.

But now that we are returning to normal conditions of existence, the evils of an Evening Exchange are revealed in their utter deformity, and the argument of necessity no longer applies. It is notorious that the existence of this establishment suggested gambling to many who would never otherwise have fallen in its way, and that speculation in its turn suggested defalcation, robbery, forgery, and fraud. Merchants, banks, bank men, brokers, and others, who were too busy in the day to watch the course of gold and stocks, found the Evening Exchange an agreeable place in which to spend an evening hour, were easily led, partly by avarice, partly by love of excitement, to "take a flyer," and become gamblers, with the usual disastrous results, almost unconsciously. Men who began by visiting the Evening Exchange for an hour once a week soon became regular habitués, and never spent an evening elsewhere. The brokers, of course, were compelled to follow their customers. Two hundred of them were separately to attend the Evening Exchange regularly, under penalty of loss of business. Yet these men had wives and daughters, who were doomed by this decree either to spend long dull evenings alone, or to seek in society a solace which involved danger to their happiness and their honor. The living motto of the institution was: There is nothing in the world better than cash and superior to dollars; happiness, honor, family fame, comfort, and life itself, are well sacrificed if cash can be got and dollars secured.

There is an Evening Exchange in Paris, one in Vienna, one in Berlin. At Antwerp there is not only an Evening Exchange, but a Sunday Bourse, where operators in Five-Twenties meet, while their children are at mass, and gamble on the course of gold in New York. But the city stock speculators never disturbed the quiet of the evening until 1862. In the excited times of 1857 occasional operations for Call used to hang around the corner of William Street and Exchange Place in the late afternoons until most of the brokers had gone home, and would then make fictitious quotations for the purpose of influencing the market on the following morning. But they never gambled after dinner. In 1862, when the issue of paper-money began to tell on current values, a similar class of operators, driven by darkness from William Street, used to repair to the corner of Avenue Hotel. For a time the landlord tolerated them, in view of the large number of cocktails they consumed. But they soon became a nuisance, and received notice to quit. A room was then hired on the corner of Fifth Avenue and Twenty-third Street; this, after a time, was exchanged for a room lower down in Fifth Avenue; and this, again, gave way to a long, wide, and low room on the upper story of a building on the east side of Broadway, two doors below Twenty-third Street. This, finally, was vacated a few months since, and the Evening Exchange was transferred to a grand building erected expressly for it in Twenty-fourth Street, by two brothers named Gallagher. This establishment was perfect of its kind. There were cushioned seats, let at $250 each per annum, for brokers; there was a gallery, and outside rows of seats for speculators and spectators. The ceiling was lofty, the atmosphere not intolerable. In the basement were billiard-tables; and Rumor whispered that a faro-table, coy card-rooms, and other still more objectionable modern improvements were accessible within a block—if not nearer. Such was the Evening Exchange at the time when public opinion crushed it out in a day.

But its glories, as they shall be told by the historian of our follies and our sorrows, will cling to this long, low room in Broadway, midway between Madison Square. It was here that the Evening Exchange won its name, and coerced the unwilling editors of the daily press to publish its reports. It was here that newspapers. It was here that the giants of 1863 showed a gogroi crowd how to make and how to lose fortunes. It was here that the wily Erie director spread his toils, and swept the money of the street into his capacious pockets. It was here that a street broker sold two millions of gold, with a falling fact, in fifteen seconds of time. It was here that KETCHUM whittled his soft pine stick, and dallied with millions, knowing that the nation's credit depended on a fence a face as if he had been playing cats cradles with his baby. To this room thousands of gentlemen every night in the week rely upon meeting there every body who was any body in Wall Street. It was a fearful place. The heat, in the depth of winter, even windows wide open, was suffocating. Every body smoked. The ceiling was very low, and, through an oversight of the proprietors, applications for subscriptions were not received in their use of the bath. To an untrained ear the din was deafening. Shouts of bidders for gold mingled with shouts of bidders for stocks, and through both you caught at intervals the shrill scream of telegraph boys bearing messages for brokers. On active nights every one was earnest, anxious, excited, and half-dreaded; quarrels were frequent, and from more than one nose "the ruby was drawn." On still nights songs were sung in chorus (rather than musical accuracy; hats were knocked off and kicked round the room with the energy which is characteristic of idle and excited stock brokers without orders. Few who visited the place will be likely to forget it.

Again, let us thank God that this shameful sight is vanished, and that out of that this pitiful for the weak and the unwary is at last filled up and covered over. As there is no business in the country more safe than the conduct of traffic in securities which represent public credit or corporate enterprise; and as there are no kinds of men as well informed, intelligent, and strictly honest, and more large-hearted than the regular brokers of Wall Street; it is well that they and their business—which command the respect of all who know them—the confidence of financial credit—should be severed once and forever from the men who spend their lives in trying to make a living by dealing secretly in stocks and gold, and from traffic which is undertaken with no other motive than to make a profit upon the fluctuations of the market. It is well that every facility should be given for the sale and exchange of all kinds of legitimate securities; but when these facilities are so watched and guarded as to exclude speculative temptations to weak and greedy men to gamble in stocks in the hope of making a rapid fortune, it is then that society should take up arms in its own defense.

THE HOUSATONIC SLAUGHTER.

THE verdict of the jury in the case of the sad slaughter upon the Housatonic Railroad is a great public humiliation. Accidents such as in this country has become so sure a risk of life that, if some legal steps are not taken for the public safety, the passengers will soonte or else privilege the directors on those who may prove not to be the responsible agents.

On the 15th of August the morning passenger train from Bridgeport to Canaan, at New Trumbull church—a distance of several miles—it overtook a disabled freight train. It was impossible to stop in time, and the engineer were backed toward Bridgeport. Fifteen minutes after the passenger train left Bridgeport a new locomotive was sent up the road upon a coal train. No signals were displayed, no messages were sent—and a frightful collision and massacre were the necessary result. If the rules of the road were always observed, under all circumstances, as of course they should have done, then those who did not follow the rules were directly responsible for the slaughter. If the rules did not require signaling, those who made them were as plainly responsible.

The jury found that the regulations of the road provided for such an emergency, and that for disregarding them CHARLES HUNT, President and Superintendent of the Company, who was on the train, HENRY L. PLUMB, Conductor, ANDREW WINSLOW, master-mechanic, who gave the order to run the new locomotive up the road, and EDWARD R. LYMAN, the engineer, were responsible. And they also found that the passengers came to their deaths by "the culpable negligence and want of proper care and caution" upon the part of those agents.

It is a verdict which the public conscience will approve: and the same conscience will demand that the accused be put upon trial for their offenses. In Connecticut the coroner's jury merely inquire into the cause of the death. The verdict is recorded in the Superior Court, and the District Attorney decides whether the offenders shall be prosecuted. If ever a case demanded prosecution it is the one under consideration. It seems to us to have been a needless slaughter. To correct such enormities the indignation of newspapers is of no avail. The enormities must be forced to pay damages which will imperil their dividends, and be plainly and immediately culpable agents should be imprisoned.

HOW TO PAY OUR DEBT TO THE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

ONE of the national debts, that due to our financial creditors, is very constantly remembered, and the fertile Yankee brain is busy in suggesting methods of facilitating its payment and lessening its burden. But the other, a debt of honor and gratitude, and therefore none the less binding, because a generous and noble people, is in great danger of being forgotten. We mean the debt of proper care for the soldiers and sailors who have served honorably in the war, and who have saved the country by the offer of their lives.

One of the most shameful passages in our history was the treatment of the soldiers after the Revolution at the close of the war. The details forcibly narrated by Mr. G. W. GREEN, in his late valuable lectures upon the Revolution, are such as to make every honest American blush. The veterans were suffered to fall into the greatest neglect. They were reluctantly paid, or not paid at all, and apparently there was no public sense of duty toward those who had earned the most thoughtful care.

In other countries there are noble great institutions, supported at vast public expense, as a home for retired soldiers and sailors. But not only does the number of our veterans at this time forbid any expenditure for such foundations, but the national honor prevents us from willingly regarding American volunteers as paupers.

Yet a very large body existing as must be ended necessarily leaves thousands of men who can not resume their old occupations, and who remain idle or are constantly become confirmed paupers if some large measures of relief are not provided. It is at once, therefore, the public interest as well as duty to guard against the existence of such a class of paupers, and demoralized by enforced idleness. And it is every man's business to do what he can, even at some sacrifice, to find the work.

With this view the Protective War-claim Association of the Seminary Commission has lately established a Bureau. SCOTT is President, ROBERT B. MINTURN is Treasurer. SENATOR MORGAN, J. W. BEEKMAN, DR. BELLOWS, JOHN JACOB ASTOR, JAMES BROWN, W. B. ASTINGALL, W. E. DODGE, JR., and THEODORE ROOSEVELT, JAMES GALLATIN, PETER COOPER, GEORGE BANCROFT, DANIEL LORD, W. H. HURLBURT, R. B. STORRS, and ALFRED PELL are Directors; and of these, three gentlemen whose names are identified with the most successful efforts during the war, HOWARD POTTER, W. E. DODGE, JUN., and THEODORE ROOSEVELT—are the Executive Committee.

It has opened a Bureau or Intelligence-office at No. 35 Chambers Street in the City of New York. Its services are given gratuitously to employers and seekers, and it keeps a register of the applicants in all the various trades and occupations, and all the applicants are honorably discharged disabled soldiers and sailors.

There are men to whom we are all under peculiar and incalculable obligations. Our personal knowledge, so far as it goes, assures us that they are steady and faithful. They are men somewhat disabled, but hating the bread of idleness and longing to work. The Bureau has accompanied a character to many of these instances besides the certificate of honorable discharge. We make, therefore, no appeal to charity, but to a sense of honorable duty, of which every generous American is conscious. If any man wishes a hand for any employment let him first apply at this Bureau. Let him say that he comes from the Bureau of Intelligence. Let him describe the first chance. They have done every thing for us. Let us, in the name of the Liberty and Union which they have maintained, do something for them.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SOUTH.

The State of Mississippi takes the lead in the work of self-reconstruction. On the 23d of August the Convention convened by the call of Governor Sharkey passed an ordinance repealing the ordinance of secession. The laws passed by the rebel Legislature, except in so far as they conflicted with the United States Constitution, were confirmed and declared valid. On the 24th Governor Sharkey communicated to the Convention a telegraphic dispatch received by him from President Johnson, congratulating the Convention on the progress made by it in having the way for the readmission of Mississippi into the Union, and declaring the President's resolution to re-establish the federal relations as to withdraw the soldiers from the State as soon as the evident loyalty of the State would permit—also his hope that other States might rapidly follow the example set by Mississippi. The same day the Convention elected, by a majority of 1 vote, Judge B. S. Fisher for governor in the forthcoming election, and approved of a memorial to President Johnson petitioning him to grant pardon to Jeff Davis.

MORE RAILWAY MURDERS.

On the 8th of August an express train returning from a picnic at Old Orchard, Maine, was thrown from the track with a bang, and the engine, baggage, and express cars were completely torn to pieces. Owing to the interposition of Providence no one was killed.

On the 10th of the above week a collision occurred on the Old Creek Railroad, near Titusville, Pennsylvania, through which several persons lost their lives. The accident was followed up by another accident of a similar character on the Delaware and Hudson Canal Railroad, in the loss of life is estimated to be nearly forty, while the number injured is very large.

August 17, the Raleigh train ran off the track near Petersburg, killing two men.

On the 28th of August a disaster occurred on the Long Island Railroad, which was occasioned by the most criminal carelessness. It appears to be the rule on this road for conductors to be out of time. On the morning of the 28th the mail train going eastward left Winfield for Jamaica, at 9 o'clock and 9 minutes, and 9 20 A. M. a train going westward started from Jamaica for Winfield, according to the conductor's statement, at 8 55 A. M. This latter train had been out ten minutes when it came into collision with the mail train. Of course Providence is responsible for the awful scene, and wounding twenty or thirty persons. But there was cause, evidently, for the carelessness of the conductor of the mail train, who was personally responsible for the human beings behind him, who knew that the express train would start from Jamaica at 8 55 A. M. He therefore right to suppose that it was the way from Winfield to Jamaica. His watch was a minute too slow, but even by that he had 14 minutes to spare when the collision occurred. Knowing that he was out of time, he should have sent a flag ahead to warn the opposite train, as the rules of the Company prescribe. But he drove on with the express. Of course Providence is merely responsible for the murder, by his negligence and his mad irregularity is the driving of trains.

WRECK OF THE "BROTHER JONATHAN."

The steamer Brother Jonathan struck a sunken rock off the Table Islands, near New Mexico, on the 30th of July 31. Intelligence of the disaster reached this city on August 7. The vessel was not lost, and all on board, at last except seventeen passengers. Brigadier-General STEELE and family were among those missing. It is reported that when last seen the General had a life-preserver on. The name of Steele is not to be confounded with Major-General H. G. Wright.

AN ELASTIC CABLE.

Dr. Russell's Story of the events connected with the unsuccessful voyage of the Great Eastern is now published. Mr. Russell is a writer who is well known as having had possession of all newspaper rosters. But he makes some very important revelations in his story. It has been said that on the 24th of July, when the first fault was discovered, the paying-out of the fault was delayed by the refusal of the second board the Great Eastern. The fact is that the electricians, who were on board the steamer, had discovered on the morning that the fault was from 40 to 60 miles distant from the Great Eastern, which had paid out that much cable.

After this all went on well for some time, and the insulation of the cable was improved to the highest degree. A little after noon on the 29th there was a total loss of insulation. The paying of over 600 miles from Valentia. This fault was also remedied, and there was no suspicion that the injury done to it was the work of a human hand. Two of the gentlemen on board the ship threaded a corps of marvelous, who undertook to watch the cable on board, and to report any suspicious thing they saw.

On the 3d of August, when 1150 miles had been paid out, the cable, it was discovered, was parting in nearly 2000 fathoms of water. What followed Dr. Russell describes as follows:

"The picking up was, as usual, exceedingly tedious, and one hour and forty-six minutes elapsed before the cable was got on board; then one of the engine's eccentric gear broke, and it took half an hour to stand by and get it on hand-spikes, aided by a wedge of wood and an elastic band, to work the engine. Meanwhile the cable was being coiled, and when the steam was got up it was found that the cable was not working in the water, and was in the act of being up caused altogether. Then occurred the great misfortune. Before we got over, Canada had left us, and the others were about leaving. The scientific gentlemen had been watching the cable with the greatest care, and making a prediction: they believed the fault was only six miles off, and that if we did not hurriedly we should have to have the fault on board, make a new splice, and proceed again. We had paid out 1186 miles, accordingly 1186 and 6 miles away. Suddenly Mr. Canning appeared in the engine-room, and announced which had all said, 'It is all over —it is gone,' then hastened onward to his cabin. Mr. Canning is a man of iron nerve and great resources, but those words had passed away, come from the companion of his youth, his friend, and, with exaggerated calmness under the circumstances, though his lips quivered and his face was pallid, he coolly said, 'Then we must get it on board ourselves.' All were on deck in a moment, and there instantly was revealed the task.

Then followed the desperate operation of grappling for the lost cable, with what results is already well known.

ARREST OF KETCHUM.

The defaulter, Edward B. Ketchum, was arrested at No. 222 West Thirty-fourth Street, New York, on the morning of August 30, by Deputy Sheriff Hall, on a warrant issued at the house occupied by two sisters ladies. He had assumed the name of Edward B. Kent, and passed as a man of independent means. He was not very careful about keeping close, and was recognized by a person acquainted with him, and information being given he was arrested, and has been committed to the Tombs to await examination.

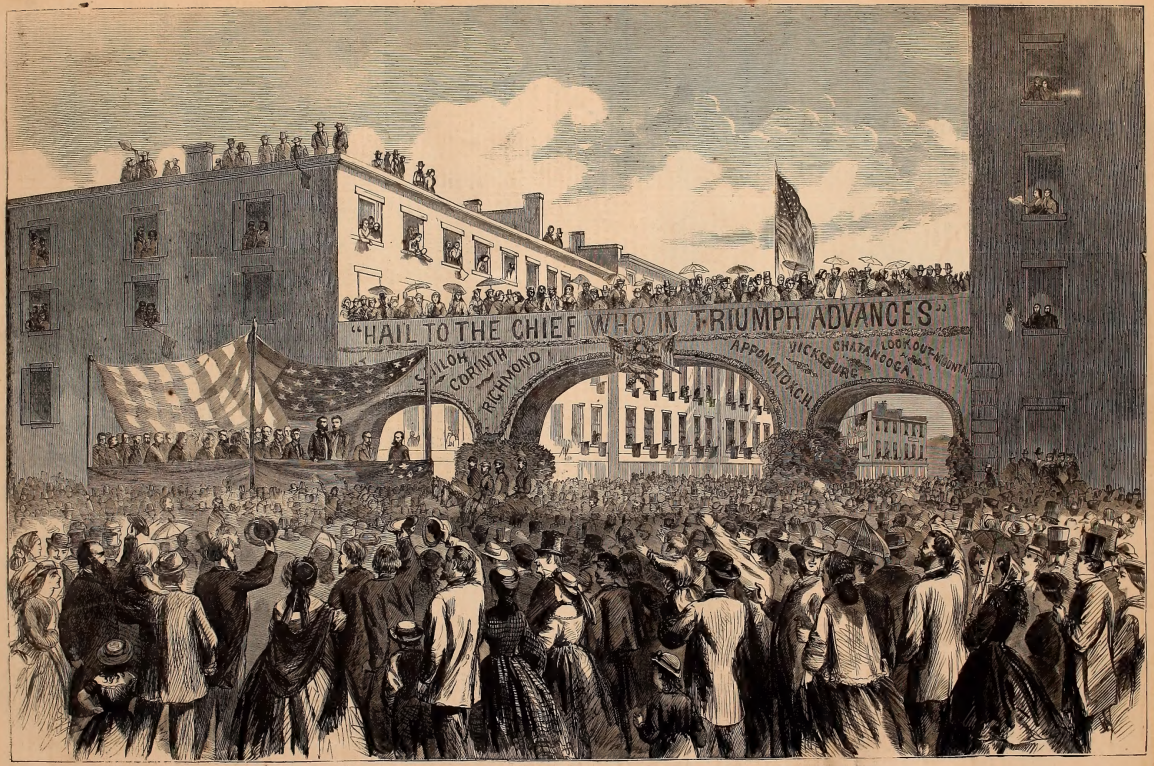
DEATH OF GOVERNOR BROUGH.

After a long and severe illness, caused by gangrene in the throat, Governor BROUGH died at Odin, Logan County, on the 29th of August, at Cleveland. Governor Brough was the Democratic candidate for Governor in 1863, and since he was born was signalized by honor and patriotism. His administration would have terminated this fall.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE CHOLERA.

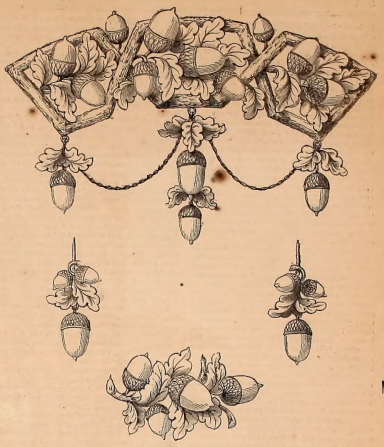


The cholera at Constantinople has been steadily increasing. Many refugees on the Bosphorus have been converted. Every steamer carries away large numbers from Constantinople. On July 31 the cases of attack numbered 800 daily, and the mortality was from 50 to 60 per cent. It is still raging in the lower classes. On the 1st August, 4, the cholera showed no signs of abatement. It continues to prevail at Smyrna. On the 3d August 90 cases were reported for one day, of which 63 proved fatal.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

The Great Eastern arrived at Crookhaven August 17. The Atlantic cable prospects were considered hopeful, and it was thought that an attempt would be made to recover the cable.

Prince Alfred is the presumptive heir to the throne of Saxe-Coburg. He attained his majority on the 6th of August, a formal declaration of which was made to him in Ehrenberg Castle.



The English Channel fleet, consisting of about a dozen vessels, including iron-clads and wooden frigates, arrived at Cherbourg August 14. On the 15th the French fleet left Toulon for Brest.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GRANT'S RECEPTION AT GALENA, ILLINOIS, AUGUST 16, 1865.—SKETCHED BY ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 565.]

HOUSE PRESENTED TO GENERAL GRANT BY THE CITIZENS OF GALENA, ILLINOIS.

GENERAL GRANT AT GALENA.

USUALLY a great man wins his honors slowly, and is moving about in the mean time among those who do him honor. The case is different with a great general who has within the space of a few years, or a few months, it may be, achieved his immortality, and who returns home after a protracted absence in the field. The Scriptural passage is often quoted that "no man is without honor save in his own country, and among his own kindred." But the maxim is certainly inapplicable to the case of one who has first won his fame on the distant battle-field, whose first coronet has been placed upon his brow by those who were strangers to his youth, and who, already resplendent with this blaze of glory, returns to his home only to have the honors repeated which he has elsewhere received, and the praises reiterated which he has heard from stranger lips.

When Galena welcomes home the Lieutenant-General it is with a pride which has a peculiar element in addition to the pride with which the rest of the nation looks upon him—just as the emotion of the mother receiving to her arms her hero-son has something in it more intense than the emotion with which the world accords its worship. There is in this added sentiment an almost selfish feature—a desire to appropriate that which, if it could be appropriated, would lose its chief value. The grandest praise is that which is most nearly world-wide. The worship which the hero's wife or child or native village gives him passes through the mould of instinct and natural affection, and thereby becomes a lesser thing—more intense, it may be, but lower in the scale of feeling; and narrower. Hero-worship can not maintain its height and grandeur in connection with domestic or merely neighborly relations. A man be the greatest of heroes, and he must in this way suffer debasement in the hearts most nearly allied to his by personal friendship or natural association. General Grant can never be to Galena just what he is to the rest of the world. But while Galena, in the violence of her affection, almost drags the General off from his high pedestal, the General has nearly given honor to Galena. When a suggestion was made to him, over a year ago, in connection with the future Presidency, that he should like some time to be President, but he should like some time to become Mayor of Galena, when he would see to the building a trifling sidewalk in that town, the absence of which had very much exercised him. The sidewalk has been repaired, and forms a prominent feature in the view the illustration which we give on page 569. We believe the General is said to read no paper but the Galena Gazette, and that he quotes the opinions of that sheet as infallible truths.

At half past eight o'clock, August 18, the special train carrying General Grant to Galena started from Wells Street Dépôt at Chicago. The engine bore a portrait of the General, and the tenders and stations on the route were crowded with people. At Marengo a triumphal arch covered with wreaths of flowers was erected across the track, and from it was a tablet bearing the following inscription: "Illinois gave to the country her best President and greatest General." The crowd cheered, and bonfires. Guns were fired as the train passed, and the church bells of the village were ringing with a merry chime. The General stepped upon the platform, and hundreds of bouquets fell at his feet.

Galena was reached about the middle of the afternoon. The city was decorated with the national colors, displayed in every shape and from nearly every window. At the De Soto House a splendid arch, tastefully planned and decorated, spanned the street. On its sides were inscriptions, "Hail to the Chief who in triumph advances," "Welcome to our Union," and the names of many of Grant's battles. Farther down the street was another arch resembling General, the sidewalk in front of the streets were crowded with citizens and visitors, prominent among whom were the soldiers. Galena has sent to the field hundreds of officers and two generals.

Hon. E. B. Washburn welcomed the General home in an appropriate speech, to which General Grant replied as follows:

"Gentlemen and Fellow-citizens,—Rev. Mr. Vincent's church was not on the train from Chicago, but kindly consented to return my thanks for this hearty welcome which you have given me."

After Mr. Vincent's speech the Galena Glee Club sang and the Galena band played, and after a grand procession General Grant went to his home, which, shining over the sidewalk above referred to, which he was going to build when elected Mayor of Galena. The General has a beautiful residence in Galena, the gift of his townspeople, the cost of which was about $16,000. In the evening there was a splendid illumination, and the ended the most glorious day ever known at Galena.

We give on page 565 an illustration of a set of magnificently jewelry which Messrs. Browne & Spaulding, of this city, have prepared for a present to Mrs. General Grant. The centre-piece of the set is a diamond cross, beautifully chased, and wrought in imitation of two cabun branches intertwined, and exhibiting discretely the knots and stumps of the trees bark. Acorns, fourteen in number, and set in caps of gold exquisitely enameled, are depending from the two main arms; one of them attached by twigs and others suspended by chains. The leaf-work, setting, etc., are inimitable. The ear-rings have each a large acorn as a pendent, with two leaves and miniature acorns above. The brooch is after the same general style, but the pendant is larger, and a leafy twig is wrought like the ear-rings and cross. On the back are the words inscribed: "Mrs. General Grant, from Browne & Spaulding." The jewels are inclosed in a fine purple velvet case, lined with white velvet and satin. This bears the inscription, in letters of gold: "Presented to Mrs. General U. S. Grant, by Browne & Spaulding, 370 Broadway, N. Y." Also, inscribed in golden words: "The wood used in this set was cut from the apple-tree under which General Grant's officers met General Lee on the morning of the surrender, April 9th, 1865, Appomattox C. H., Va."

WHAT DICK BLAIZE FOUND AT CHURCH.

"I'd bean to church. I'm not a man to sail under false colors, and pretend I went regular, for I didn't; but when it has been on a three-year cruise to and through no end o' gales, and come home safe and sound at last, it's only right he should go and thank himself and Providence for't, but I had a good old mother once, and she taught me a great deal that I've forgotten now (more shame to me), and some things I remember. So, feeling that the Lord's hand had been in my coming home alive, I went to where they say he comes oftenest, and that's to church.

It was a grand sort of place; but I had my longshore togs on, and my new silver watch, and a collar as white as old sail—and in I walked, bold as brass. It was evening, almost over—and the lights were all alight. Chaplain, he was there in the wheel-house, and all the passengers aboard. I sailed up the straits, looking for a pew to haul, but I sailed up the straits, looking for a pew to haul, but I sailed up the straits, looking for a pew to haul, but down beside the bed, and began to overhaul the various masquerading dresses which his son had left out upon his chair. There was a neat suit of green and gold, intended as a forester's dress; there was a costume of the time of Francis I., covered with spangles; and last, but not least, there was a bear-skin suit, so contrived that the wearer of it was covered with fur from head to feet, and looked precisely like a black bear escaped from a traveling caravan. M. Oudle turned this dress over and over, and its subject attracted his interest. He thought he should like to see whether it would fit its person; he therefore arrayed himself in the bear-skin, and found that it suited him to a T. Just then the idea entered his head that the opportunity of disobeying Madame Oudle was very tempting, and he presented itself. Madame Oudle was nearly as great a fool as her husband, and that is saying a good deal. She was fearful of the vulgar belief in witchcraft and demonology, and believed implicitly that warlocks could transform themselves into wild beasts for the purpose of devouring children.

"Now," mused M. Oudle, "is a chance for me to eradicate these baneful superstitions from my nature. If she sees me in this dress, and takes me to be a were-wolf, and when I show her the deception, she will never believe in the supernatural any more."

Accordingly he walked to his wife's door and listened. The servant was still with her mistress, as M. Oudle ascertained down the kitchen-chimney, intending to wait till his good lady was alone; and that he might know when the maid was dismissed he placed the door ajar.

Then taking up a book he seated himself before the fire. The book happened to be Grimm's "Domestic Stories," and M. Oudle opened it at the chapter on Lycanthropy.

He read on, and the tales of were-wolves floated in strange colors through his brain till he fell asleep with his head on the table and the book on his lap. And as he slumbered he dreamed of a supper being provided by the Evil One with wolf-skins which they were condemned to wear for seven years, and of cyclops contested by Ogres with an alout in bestial form, till a piercing shriek and a crash brought him with a start to his feet.

The lady's maid, after having pinned her mistress's back hair into a heap and fitted over it the night-cap, had left the chamber and had come down stairs. As she passed the dining-room she saw that there was still a light in it, and thinking that the candles had not been extinguished, she entered it immediately to put them out.

There in the dead of night she stood, and saw before her a monstrous black beast that sat asleep before the fire, snoring loudly, with its head on the table and its snout up in the air, its hind paws on the fender, a silk pocket-handkerchief over one knee, and a book on the lap. No wonder that she dropped her candle and screamed.

But the shriek which testified to her fear frightened M. Oudle out of the few senses he did possess. He sprang up, bewildered with his dreadful dream and with the assumption of the bear-skin, and with the last impressions produced by Bedlo, and by the dream stamped upon his brain, he jumped to the conclusion that he was bewitched, and that he had been changed into a were-wolf. For this evil he had been changed into a were-wolf. For this evil he had been changed into a were-wolf. For this evil

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

No city has greater occasion to be proud of her police than New York. Numbering but two thousand men, our policemen—several of the interesting features of whose life we illustrate on pages 568 and 569—work as hard and suffer more from exposure than almost any other class of men. Their life is in great measure like that of the soldier in the field. Their discipline is as strict as that of an army corps; they are out on duty at all seasons of the year, at all hours of the day and night, and in all sorts of weather. Not unfrequently they lose their lives in the performance of their duty. When a riot breaks forth and the community is panic-stricken, their place is in the front of the fight, and on their positions they take blows as well as give them. Every precinct has its one police-station, but has a score of lip-service forces, from which proceed thousands of men with crazed brains, and fully equipped for wrong-doing and misery sort. Against these men and against others who lead a more secret career, plotting more deliberate crimes in the dark, and defiant the vagrants and abandoned women of this city, do this gallant two thousand daily contend with wonderful success. Only the strictest discipline and the most untiring vigilance make it possible for so small a body of men to maintain order in so large a city. The care which the policemen take to keep the streets in healthy shape is much in the accomplishment of this end. So square of suspicious-looking men is allowed to gather on the street corners. No disreputable establishment is allowed to offend beyond a certain point without receiving a "downing from the police." Much too is accomplished through fear, on account of the immunity with which, in a serious disturbance, the police are allowed to break heads and arms.

The Metropolitan Police District comprises New York, Kings, Westchester, and Richmond counties, and the towns of Newtown, Flushing, and Jamaica, in Queens County. Mr. THOMAS C. ACTON is President of the Board of Police Commissioners, to the chief executive officer of the department is Mr. JOHN A. KENNEDY, who has commanded the police force during the most perilous periods the metropolis ever experienced. He gives his orders through the Inspectors, of whom there are four. They are JOHN CARPENTER, GEORGE W. DILKS, JAMES LEONARD, and JOHN S. FOLK. Of the first three Inspectors we give portraits in the page above mentioned. Connected with the department there is a board of ten surgeons and six assistants.

The preliminary examination of the candidates for the office of policeman is no joke. The candidate is the subject of personal scrutiny, to be certain that there is no trace of a consumptive tendency or other weakness in his constitution. Once a member, however, he is subject to no further personal supervisor. No one can become a member who is not a citizen of the United States, or who has ever been convicted of crime, or who can not read and write English understandingly. The city is divided into thirty-two precincts, to each of which belongs a captain, four sergeants (usually), and from forty to fifty patrolmen.

All the members are, after their admission, instructed in military drill and baton exercise. Captain COPELAND, chief of the Broadway squad, is drill-officer of the force.

The Sanitary Company of the police consists of a captain, one sergeant, and thirty-six men. Twelve more of these are occupied in the examination of tenement houses, yards, sinks, and nuisances of all descriptions. The number of reports made by the squad during the year ending October 31, 1864, was 27,631. Seven men are detailed as truant officers, five of whom visit our public schools daily, and ascertain if the teachers have lists of truants and absentees, who are visited at their respective residences, and the cause of absence inquired into. The number reported by the teachers to this squad for the year ending October 31, 1864, was 6838. Of this number 2078 were found truant, but cause, 1750 were referred so as to attend school regularly, 83 arrested and taken to school, and 145 were committed to the Juvenile Asylum. The duties of two of these men consist in attending especially to the Juvenile Asylum and the Roman Catholic Asylum. This department is of the greatest importance. Our streets are full of vagrant and destitute children. There are a great number of asylums for children of this class, and they are all full, but the streets are just as full. "Never," said the Rev. Edward Thurston last year, "in the history of our city has infant wretchedness stalked forth in such multiplied and such humiliating forms. I speak not from hearsay, but of what my own eyes have seen and my own heart felt. For the last ten years have I been a close observer of what has passed around me. The rising generation of this great metropolis, and I can not suppress the humiliating confession that even upon Rome, in the corrupt age of Augustus, never witnessed a more open and frightful declension in morals, nor witnessed among certain classes of the young a more total abandonment of honor, of truth, and piety, and even the commonest decencies of life."

The annals of crime in the city, as given in President Acton's last annual report, are interesting. The total number of arrests in all the precincts for the year was 54,752. Of these over one-half were arrests of persons born in Ireland. Not quite one-third of all the persons arrested were born in this country, and a large proportion of these were of foreign descent.

There were arrested by the Metropolitan Police, for crimes of violence of a serious character, in 1863 and 1864 respectively, as follows:

	1863.	1864.
For felonious assault	538	467
For assault on policemen	13	16
For attempt at rape	15	10
For insulting females in the street	18	31
For murder	70	80
For manslaughter	7	10
For rape	11	8
For threatening life	11	20
	683	643

During the year ending the 30th November last five members of the police force met their deaths by violence at the hands of desperate ruffians. The names of the policemen killed were GEORGE W. DEAVEA, JOHN O'BRIEN, JOSEPH NUTEY, CHARLES CURREN, and ASHER ESTERBROOK. Thirteen were seriously injured and wounded in the same way. This is caused in great measure by the immunity with which persons are allowed to carry about concealed weapons.

Of the arrests made over one-ninth were for assault and battery; one-sixth were for disorderly conduct, and almost one-seventh for intemperance and to the comparative degree of criminality of the two sexes, we find that, as nearly as possible, the number of men arrested doubles that of the women. In both cases here given the ratio holds. The crime is attained is about the same. Between the ages of 10 and 20 there were arrested of males 6775, of females 3117—total 9892. This at this early period it seems that the masculine tendency toward crime is to the feminine as two to one. Between the ages of 20 and 30 the feminine tendency toward crime increases more in proportion than the masculine. Thus, between these years, 14,147 males were arrested, and 8057 females. As compared with the period from 10 to 20 years we find that, while the male ratio has become little more than twice as many, the female arrests number nearly four times as many. From the age of 30 up to 60 the amount of crime is distributed in both sexes and in about the same proportion, being reduced about one-half in either case. Thus, during the term of 30 years 14,147 males arrested were 8057, and of females 5038. During the next decade 7000 males were the number in either case is again reduced one-half, being for males 4709, and for females 2479. After fifty the decrease is very rapid—the ratio of males to females that age being, of males 2127, and of females 787.

The numbers and ratios above given do not exactly represent the number of persons who were finally arrested after the age of 30 so much as the diminution of actual crime. For it must be remembered that the number of persons arrested after the age of 30 is but a very trifle more than half the number living between 30 and 40; and that the whole number of persons living over 50 years of age is but two-fifths the number living between the ages of 40 and 50. Thus, in New York county, there were living between the ages of 30 and 40 in the year 1855, 83,305 persons; between 40 and 50 there were 52,403; over 50 there were 41,135. Now we estimate that the number of arrests between the ages of 40 and 50 was just about half the number of arrests between 30 and 40, so we find the diminution in the number of persons living to be in the same ratio. The conclusion, therefore, is that the criminal tendency is about the same in the two decades considered.

If we compare the two decades 20–30 and 30–40, we find that while in the former there were two-thirds as many persons living as in the former, there are only about half as many arrests. Here there is a decided diminution in the criminal tendency. This tendency appears to reach its maximum between the ages of 20 and 30. After 30 years of age there are four-fifths as many persons living as in the decade 40–50; the number of arrests after 50 are three-fifths, or less than one-half as many as between 40 and 50.

Another consideration also should be taken into the account, and that is that the arrests made in any year represents rather the amount of actual crime than the number of criminals. Those addicted to irregular and disorderly habits are more than those habits before the age of twenty—the majority of them before fifteen; and it is well known that after the latter age the men are more frequently arrested. The 54,000 arrests may not involve over 20,000 persons. In fact, the annual reports of police reports do not give the number of persons arrested as well as the number of arrests.

Among the occupations of those in the arrests made during the year we find some curious statistics. Forty arrests were made of actors and actresses; two of auctioneers; 1215 of bakers; 1176 clerks come in for a goodly number (1336), also the carmen (1215). There were 2562 arrests of peddlers, 167 of bartenders, 1435 of laborers, 1176 of blacksmiths 856, of carpenters 591, of expressmen 240, of machinists 462, of seamstresses 592, of tailors 619, and of waiters 1307. Of the whole number of arrests 23,432 were of married and 31,319 of single persons. Of those who could not read or write there were 16,297.

Among the suggestions made by President Acton in the more important is the following, since there is one of very great importance, namely, that the police should have a wider range of inspection. He says:

"The duties of health wardens, street inspection, every form of sanitary inspection, including inspection of weights and measures, and those of the markets, should be under very active police duties. The police could, without injury, be charged with the duty of inspection and supervision of places of amusement, houses of entertainment, houses of refreshment and prostitution, gambling-houses, lottery or policy offices, and pawnbrokers. There is a large class of occupations, which from their nature furnish opportunities for practices so injurious to the public welfare when prosecuted by unworthy persons, or in an improper manner, that the law has made their pursuits the subject of licenses from municipal authorities, as for instance, those of keepers of hotels, restaurants, circus-shows, theatres, and places of amusement, pawnbrokers, junkshop keepers, venders, auctioneers, carmen, hackmen, and omnibus drivers. The police could, from their duties, be the arm relied on to shield the public from the improper and depredatious low as to be practiced in these several callings."

THE ANGEL'S GIFT.

Out among the sunny meadows
With the sunshine in her hair,
Bending, into sheaves the shadows
That are falling here and there.
Singing through the dusky valleys,
Chasing echoes up and down,
Goes the little maiden Lucy,
With her locks of shadowy brown.

Four sweet summer-times have risen
From the green lap of the spring,
And the beauty of her garments
Has been over every thing;
Four times have the autumn meadows
Been with golden glory hung,
Since the angels left her lying
'Neath the pearly gate of life.

Down and down the sunny future
Lies the way that she must tread,
Very fair it seems and radiant,
With the sunshine overhead;
May the white hands of the angels
Guide her steps to where the light
Reaches to the far-off glory
That is never dim with night!

CHAPTER XL.

THE CAUSE OF LIBERTY.

HAD SAXON been suddenly plunged into a cold bath it could scarcely have brought him to his senses more rapidly than did the remembrance of Vaughan and Colonna. The thought of what his lawyer cousin would say to him.

"It isn't as if he hadn't cautioned me, either," said he, half aloud, as he set himself down, "quite chop-fallen," at the foot of a great oak in an unfrequented hollow of the park. And then one unpleasant recollection evoked another, and he remembered how William Trefalden had joked with him about fetters of flowers, and made him promise to "let no go doing; and how he had boasted of himself as more invulnerable than Achilles. He also remembered that his cousin had especially inquired whether he had not yet been called upon to subscribe to the Italian fund, and had given him much good advice as to what his answer should be when that emergency might arise. To put his name down for a moderate sum, and commit himself to nothing further—those were William Trefalden's instructions to him; but how had he observed them? He had not only signed that other promise of signing no more large checks without consulting his cousin; and wiser reliance would his actions place upon his words in the future. But Saxon groaned in spirit as he thought of these things; and the more he thought of them the more intensely he disliked himself.

He did not care in the least about the money, although he had, in truth, been mulcted of an enormous sum; but he cared a great deal about breaking his word, and he saw that it must be broken to one and all by the other. He also saw on which hand it was to be.

He had given the check to Miss Colonna, and Miss Colonna must return the money; there was clearly no help for that. But then he entertained misgivings as to the check itself, and began to devise some means of making any thing like reliance enough at his banker's to meet it. In this case what was to be done? The money, of course, must be paid, but who was to get it, and how was the getting of it to be achieved? Would that mysterious process called "selling out" have to be undergone?

Saxon puzzled his brains over these abstruse financial questions for half an hour, but could make nothing of them. At last he came to the very disagreeable conclusion that William Trefalden was the proper person of solving the difficulty, and must be consulted without delay; but at the same time he did not feel at all sure that his cousin might not refuse to help him in the matter. This was a fearful supposition, and almost drove the young fellow to despair. For Saxon might refuse to help him in a simple, honest way—not so much, perhaps, for any lovable quantities that he might imagine him to possess, as for the mere fact that his cousin was his cousin, and he trusted him. He had also a vague idea that William Trefalden was under the debt to serve him, and that he owed him a profound debt of gratitude. Any how, he would not offend him by any unnecessary reticence. He quite resolved that Miss Colonna should have the full benefit of her check.

Thinking this, he remembered that he had authorized her to double the amount. What if she should take him at his word?

"By Jove, then," said he, addressing a plump rabbit that had been gravely watching him from a convenient distance for some minutes past, "I don't help it if she does! The money's my own, after all, and I have the right to give it away if I choose. Besides, I've given it in the cause of liberty!"

But his heart told him that liberty had played a very unimportant part in the transaction.

CHAPTER XLI.

A COUNCIL OF WAR.

In the mean while a general council was being held in the octagon turret. The councilors were Signor Colonna, Lord Castlestowers, and Major Vaughan, and the subjects under discussion were Baldisseroni's dispatch and Saxon Trefalden's check.

The dispatch was undoubtedly an important one, and contained more stirring news than any which had transpired from Italy since the Napoleonic campaign; but that other document, with its startling array of numerals, was certainly no less momentous. In Major Vaughan's opinion it was the more momentous of the two; and yet his brow darkened over it, and it seemed to the two others that he was not altogether so well pleased as he might have been.

Castlestowers was genuinely delighted, and as much surprised as delighted.

"It is a noble gift," said he. "I had not dreamed that Trefalden was so stanch a friend to the cause."

"I was not aware that Mr. Trefalden had hitherto interested himself about Italy in any way," observed Major Vaughan, coldly.

"Well, he has interested himself now to some purpose. Besides, he has but just come into his fortune."

Signor Colonna smoothed the check as it lay before him on the desk, filled in the date, crossed it, and inserted his own name as that of the person to whom it was payable.

"I wonder what I had better do with it," said he, thoughtfully.

"With what?" asked the Earl.

Colonna pointed to the check with the feather end of his pen.

"Why, cash it, of course, and send the money off without delay."

The Italian smiled and shook his head. He was a better man of business than his host, and he foresaw some of those very difficulties which were the cause of so much perplexity to Saxon himself.

"It is not always easy to cash large sums," said he. "I must speak to Mr. Trefalden before I do any thing with his check. Is he in the house?"

To which the Earl replied that he would see and left the room.

While he was gone Vaughan and Colonna went back to the dispatch and discussed the position of affairs in Sicily. Thence they passed on to the question of the Anglican, and consulted about the best means of bestowing Saxon's donation. At last they agreed that the larger share should be sent out at once, and that it was expedient in munitions of war.

"It's a heavy sum," said the dragoon. "If you want a messenger to take it over I am at your service."

"Thanks. Can you go the day after to-morrow?"

"To-night, if you like. My time is all my own until Monday. By-the-way, who is Mr. Trefalden's banker?"

He put out his hand for the check as he said this, that Colonna could see the name than pass it to him. After examining it for some moments in silence he gave it back, and said:

"I don't like his figure, Signor Colonna? see they are not yours."

To which the Italian replied very composedly,

"No, they are Olimpia's."

Saxon's name was added, and walked over to the window.

"I shall ask Bertaldi to give me something to do, when I am out there," he said, after a moment's pause. "I have had no fighting since I came back from India, and I am tired to death of this do-nothing life."

"Bertaldi will be only too glad," replied Colonna. "One experienced officer is worth more to us now than a squadron of recruits."

The dragoon replied impatiently, and pulled at the ends of his mustache. It was a habit he had when he was ill at ease.

"I'm sorry for Castlestowers," he said, presently. "He'd give his right hand to go over with me himself, on a shot at Francis Joseph."

"I know he would; but it can not be—it must not be. I would not countenance his going for the world," replied the Italian, quickly. "It would break his mother's heart."

"I never entered into the spheres of my relations' hearts," said Castlestowers, turning to Saxon, said Major Vaughan. "But you have enjoyed the advantage of her acquaintance longer than I have, so I leave you to your theology."

At this moment the door opened, and the Earl came in alone.

"I can't find Trefalden any where," said he. "I have looked for him all over the house, in the stables, and all through the grounds. He was last seen on the terrace, talking to Miss Colonna, and nobody knows what has become of him since."

"He's somewhere in the park, of course," said Colonna.

"I don't think so. I met my mother as I came in. She has been wandering about the park all the morning, and has not seen him."

"If I were you, Castlestowers, I'd have the Slane dragged," said Major Vaughan, with a short, harsh laugh. "He has repented of that check, and drowned himself in a paroxysm of despair."

"That nonsense!" said Colonna, almost angrily; but he thought it odd for all that, and so did the Earl.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE MAUSOLEUM.

THERE was a very curious object in Castlestowers park, the shape of which was like a watchman's lantern, and the material blue granite. It stood on a little eminence in a retired corner of the domain, was surrounded by a double row of dwarf cypresses, about three feet and a half in height, and enshrined the last mortal remains of a favorite hunter belonging to the late Earl. It was called "the mausoleum."

Any one more hopelessly edifice it would be difficult to conceive; but the late Earl had intended it to be a model of elegant simplicity, and had wasted some hundreds upon it. Being abroad when his old horse died, he sawhead a rough outline of the Temple of Vesta on a sheet of foreign note-paper, and sent it up to his steward, with instructions to hand it over for execution to a Guildford stone-mason. But the mason was no draughtsman, and the stone-mason, who had never heard of the Temple of Vesta in his life, was no genius; and thus it happened that the park at Castletowers came to be disfigured by an architectural phenomenon compared with which the wildest vagaries of Waterloo Bridge were chaste and classic structures. The Earl, however, died at Naples, in happy ignorance of the dread that had been done, and his successor had not thought it worth while to pull the building down.

When Saxon rose from his seat under the great oak, it was yet so early that he was tempted to prolong his walk. So he struck backling on among the ferns, watching the rabbits, and thinking of Miss Colonna, till he found himself, quite unwittingly, at the foot of the little eminence on which the mausoleum was built.

It so happened that, although he had been more than ten days at Castletowers, he had never before strayed into this particular corner of the park. The phenomenon was consequently a novelty in his eyes, and he walked round it wonderingly, contemplating its ugliness from every point of view. He even went so far as to try the door, which was painted to look like green bronze, and studded all over with great sexagonal bosses. It swung back, however, quite easily, and Saxon walked in.

The place was so dark, and the day outside was so brilliant, that for the first few moments he could see nothing distinctly. At length a dumpy pillar on a massive square pedestal came in view in the centre of the building, and Saxon saw by the inscription carved upon it (in very indifferent English) that the object of the edifice was by enmity was a horse. And then he sat down on the base of the column, and contemplated the mausoleum from within.

It was, if possible, uglier inside than outside; that is to say, the resemblance to a lantern was more perfect. The dumpy column was carried exactly like a gigantic candle, and the very walls were paneled in granite in a way that suggested glass to the fanciful imaginative observer. Had the stone-mason possessed but a single grain of original genius, he would have added a little brass handle in solid granite to the outside, and made the thing complete.

While Saxon was thinking thus, and lazily criticising the late Earl's Latin, he suddenly became aware of a lady coming slowly up between the cypresses.

He thought at first that the lady was Miss Colonna, and was on the point of stepping out to meet her; but in almost the same instant he saw that she was a stranger. She was looking down as she walked, with her face so bowed that he was almost as if he were counting the daisies in the grass as she came along.

Saxon scarcely knew what to do. He had risen from his seat, and now stood a little way back in the deep shadow of the mausoleum. While he was yet hesitating whether to come forward or remain where he was, the young lady paused and looked round, as if expecting some one.

She had no sooner lifted up her face than Saxon remembered to have seen it before. He could not for the life of him tell when or where; but he was as confident of the fact as if every circumstance connected with it were fresh in his memory.

She was very fair of complexion, with soft brown hair, and large childlike gray-blue eyes with just that sort of startled, pathetic expression about them which one sees in the eyes of a caged animal. Saxon remembered even that look in them—remembered how that image of the caged chamois had presented itself to him when he saw them first—and then all at once, there flashed upon him the picture of a railway station, an empty train, and a group of three persons standing beside the open door of a second-class carriage.

Yes; he remembered all about it now, even to the amount he had paid for her fare, and the fact that the lost ticket had been taken from Sedgebrook Junction. Involuntarily he put his still further into the gloom of the mausoleum. He would not have shown himself, or have put himself in the way of being thanked, for all the world.

Then she sighed, as if she were weary or disappointed, and turned a few steps nearer; and as she continued to advance Saxon continued to retreat, till she was nearly at the door of the mausoleum, and he had got quite round behind the pillar. It was like a scene upon a stage; only that in this instance the actors were not comprising their parts, and there were no spectators to see them.

Just as he was speculating upon what he should do if she came in, and asking himself whether it would not be better, even then, to walk boldly out and risk the chances of recognition, the young lady decided the question for him by sitting down on the threshold of the building.

Saxon was out of his perplexity now. He was a gentleman, it was true; but his time was all his own, and he could afford to waste it in peeping from behind a pillar at the back of a young lady's bonnet. Besides, there was an air of adventure about the proceeding that was quite delightful, as far as it went.

So he stood quite quiet, scarcely daring to breathe for fear of alarming her, and amused himself by conjecturing what misfortune could this particular corner of Castletowers park. What it possible, for instance, that the Earl had been insane enough to have the phenomenon photographed, and was she about to color the photograph on the spot? The idea was too monstrous to be entertained for a moment! And then the young lady sighed again—such a deep-drawn, profound, melancholy sigh, that Saxon's heart ached to hear it.

It was no sigh of mere fatigue. Unlearned as he was in the mysteries of feminine woe, he knew at once that such a sigh could only come from a heart heavily laden. And then he fell to wondering what that burden could be, and whether he could help, in any anonymous way, to lighten it for her. What if he could save a hundred-pound note in a blank envelope? She looked poor, and even ill.

But at this point his meditations were broken in upon. A shadow darkened the doorway. Miss Riviere rose from her seat upon the threshold; and Saxon Somerset's heart stood suddenly before Saxon's astonished eyes.

CHAPTER XLIII.

WHAT SAXON HEARD IN THE MAUSOLEUM.

LADY CASTLETOWERS was the first to speak; and her voice, when she spoke, was measured and haughty.

"You have requested to see me again, Miss Riviere," she said.

"I have been compelled to do so," was the almost inaudible reply.

"And I have come here at your request."

Lady Castletowers paused, as if for some acknowledgment of her condescension in having done so; but no such acknowledgment came.

"I must, however, beg you to understand quite distinctly that it is for the last time," she said, presently. "It is impossible that I should hold any future communication with you otherwise than by letter, and then only at stated periods, as heretofore."

The young lady murmured something of which Saxon could not distinguish a syllable.

"Then you will oblige me by saying it at once, and as briefly as possible," replied Lady Castletowers.

Saxon felt very uncomfortable. He knew that he ought not to be there. He knew this to be a strictly private conversation, and was quite aware that he ought not to overhear it; and yet what was he to do? He could still walk out, it was true; and explain his unintentional eavesdropping; but he had an instinctive feeling that Lady Castletowers would not have come to the mausoleum to confer in the park if she had not wished to keep the meeting secret, and that his presence there, however well it might explain itself, would only cause her ladyship a very disagreeable surprise. Or he might stop his ears, and so be, virtually, deaf and dumb to all that was passing around him; but then he felt certain that this young girl whom he had assisted once before was now in some great trouble, and that he could help her again if only he was that he might assist her again. So, as these thoughts flashed through his mind, Saxon considered that he was justified in not trying to stop his ears—at least for the present.

Miss Riviere, however, answered Miss Riviere to state her business at once, and also to state it briefly; but it seemed as if the task were strangely difficult, for the girl hesitated.

At length she said, with a kind of sob:

"Lady Castletowers, my mother is very ill."

And then Saxon could see that she was weeping.

"Do you mean that your mother is dying?" asked her relentless, coldly.

"No; but that she must die if she does not receive the means to save her."

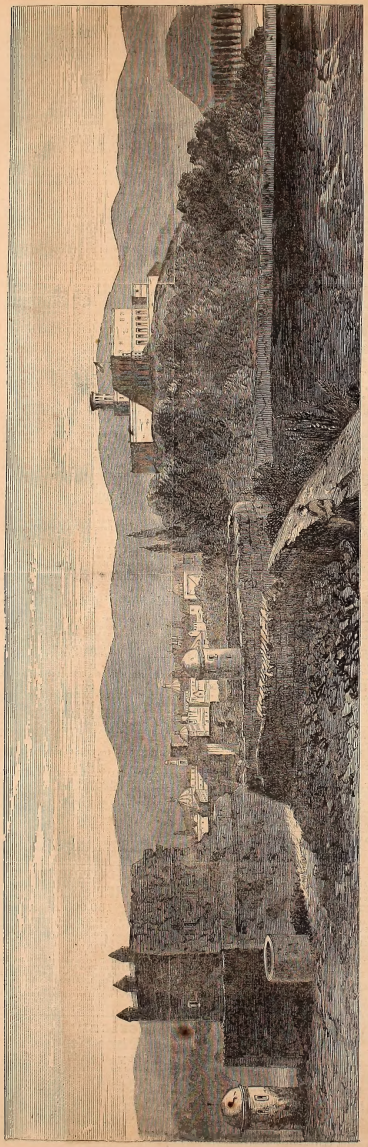
"What do you call the necessary means?"

"Doctor Fisher says that she must go to some place on the Italian lakes, and that Mentone, many women are in the habit of bleaching their dark hair in order to produce the effect of the fashionable golden red. I am informed, too—and I can ask my personal testimony to the fact—that individual girls who have been on the shelf until they are no longer young, are now taking off in the shape of wigs and false hair.

GIANTS.—In the time of Augustus Cæsar there were two persons living in Rome who were each nine feet high. Their bodies, however, were not ten feet in height. Their bodies, after death, were kept and preserved at enormous cost, and were placed within the tallisting gardens. Pliny in reply to a question from the Emperor Claudius as to the manner a certain Gabbara lived to the age of 150 years, brought out a book, and says he was nine feet nine inches high. Pompey had a Spanish slave who was eight feet, and Posidonius measured eight feet and a half. He writes of barbarians seven feet high. Pliny also mentions a race of Ethiopians who lived entirely upon the flesh of serpents, and the bones of their parents formed the principal part of their domestic chair. He could draw a loaded wagon without the assistance of oxen. Gabbara took a ship in his hand as a plaything for a child. He also crushed the hardest stones in his hand. Augustus had a tooth of this giant, which was five inches long. Pliny and Valerius Maximus speak of Polydamus, a celebrated athlete, who had the strength of a lion. He slew a lion of Cithæron, and with one stroke of his fist killed a bull. Another bull, which he held by the hind foot, could not disengage himself, notwithstanding his struggles to escape, grasped him with such strength that he could not move his hind foot.

THE AMENDE HONORABLE.—The Jockey Club says Galignani's Messenger has just lost one of its most amiable members, M. Scudo, the well-known critic. The following anecdote is related of him: "Perceiving one day, after a heavy fall of rain, a man in the middle of the road endeavoring to get the edge of the wide pavement of the Boulevard, he politely begged him to step upon his back instead of running the risk of soon before, he gallantly advanced, and the lady got to his relief. Scudo was a heavy man, and the lady made no objection to the mode of transit. As she passed down, expressed her gratitude as a lady only can, the amiable critic replied: 'Thereupon, Mademoiselle, I beg you, I repaired the wrong by again transporting her, with the same precaution, to the very spot where he had first met her, and took his leave with a profound salutation."

LAUGHTER AND LONGITUDE OF SUNDAY.—Between the 30th and 31st degrees of north latitude—that is to say, between John o' Groat's House and the boundary line which separates England from Scotland—is situated a country of good morals and religion to play musical instruments on Sunday, and to sing songs. You will perceive that in these parallels of latitude whistling on Sunday is down right impiety. Get into a train bound for the south, and in two hours' time you will have left the whistling parts behind you, and you may whistle now on Sunday. You may sing what songs you please, you may play the fiddle; say, you may even dance, and few will challenge your pleasure. It is but a twelve-hours' journey from Edinburgh to London. At six o'clock in the morning you are whistling over your breakfast in Princes Street, and the South hotels in attendance is horrified. At six o'clock in the evening you are listening to the band in Regent's Park; and thousands of persons are dancing around, and in all their best, promenading up and down to the time. If you were in Edinburgh the Scots' hands and arms in this scene—horns blowing, drums beating, and 20,000 persons dancing—would be in a state of fearful dread over in her breath and exclaim, "Eh, gude be here! Did ever ony body see the like o' this? Surely the end of the warld is nae far whear they expect to gang to!" But now, in turn, take one of these Scots to the Crystal Palace on Sunday; more fun where the laughter is to be heard. Let him go and see, and she will be astonished. Let him go to Peckham going to the theatre on Sunday evening as the sun is setting, and see the Londoners promenading in Regent's Park and listening to polkas. A few degrees of latitude make a wonderful difference in the habits of people make a difference another. Go north, and you mount; which is the more south, and you go to the fidlers' more sideways, a little toward the east, and you may be whistling on Sunday, and go to the devil. No policeman rules the right morality in this matter I will not presume to say.



A GOOD CHARACTER.—A good character is to a young man what a firm foundation is to a city—the corner-stone on which he erects a happy life; it is one well built with entire integrity, and all who behold it will have confidence in its stability, and all who behold it will have confidence in its stability, and all who behold it will admire and respect it. Such is the building of this defective and you can see it will tumble down at the slightest touch. Such is one it will tumble down at the slightest touch. Such is one it will tumble down at last, and mingle all that was built upon it with it. Without a good character no man can be happy. Society is a curse; with it, scarcely can a well. Happiness is the result of the love of virtue, and the love of virtue is the result of the hope of truth, all that is truth and all that is false exist together in the world, but in resisting in the vein of years, centres in and is derived from a good character. Therefore acquire this as the first and most valuable good.

THE SWORDS are a gay race. Balls, soirées, and carnivals are their delight. Dancing is their favorite kind of music, and sing well. One of the heros to which a stranger has to submit on his first visit to Spain is, that he enters a shop or public house, and keeping it of as long as he stays. A Spaniard will not do this, from mere acquaintance, so that it is almost as much off the hand as the ass. Gambling is a vice most common to Spaniards. The carpeted floors are as clean as a man-of-war's deck. As and cigarettes are smoked, and drunkenness is a vice from which they slip off before entering the room, in vet or many women, also, than their men. The Spanish ladies should leave its mark in little pools on the floor. Touch, ing the balcony in the evening, at 9 o'clock, the performers it to begin at six p. m. on Saturday, and end at six p. m. on Sunday! On the latter, the entertainment begins at 3 p. m. as secular as the morning; while the evening of Sunday is the fashionable resort of the rich and poor alike. The people are hard drinkers; the consumption of native brandy being almost as great as that of water. Smoking is common, and cold in the country. Yet they are rarely seen drunk, for the habit is considered disreputable.

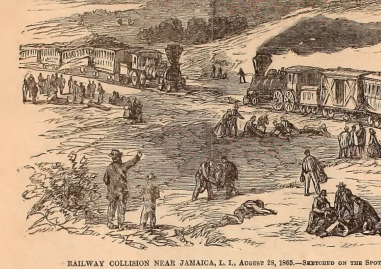
THE EMPEROR MAXIMILIAN'S PALACE AT CHAPULTEPEC.

MAXIMILIAN, EMPEROR OF MEXICO.



MAXIMILIAN AND CARLOTTA.

Few persons in the political world occupy a more conspicuous place than the Emperor MAXIMILIAN, who has now reigned a year and a half in the "Halls of the Montezumas." The illustrations accompanying this sketch have recently arrived from Mexico. The Emperor is represented in his full imperial array, and sat for the picture only a few weeks since at the palace.

A brother of FRANCIS JOSEPH of Austria, and for some time Governor of the Lombardo Venete under the Austrian sway, the young prince has had no little experience as a ruler, and enters his new sphere in Mexico with a thorough knowledge of men, and with the reputation in Europe for abilities which his career thus far (however much it conflicts with the traditional policy of the Great Republic) seems amply to have warranted. MAXIMILIAN is thirty-four years of age, somewhat over six feet in height, large in proportion, and has the air and bearing of a man of great cultivation and intelligence. His manner is characterized by consideration and kindness to all; and with a just appreciation of the requirements of Mexico he surrounds himself with able and experienced advisers. None of his ministers can keep pace with his active industry, which reaches to every part of the Empire, and he seems to be quite equal to the vast amount of labor which his novel position demands. The earlier part of his life was passed in the Austrian navy, where—as was the case in Italy—his gleaming address, his gracious character, and active habits made him every where popular. This has given him the name, in Europe and Mexico, of the "Italian gentleman;" both in Europe and Mexico MAXIMILIAN is remarkably agreeable. He speaks six languages perfectly, and is the author of several German works on scientific subjects, as well as on those of belles-lettres. His personal address is earnest, prompt, and ready, and his intellectual German face beams with genuine benevolence, tempered by a gentleness, dignity and the highest type of culture, intelligence, and humanity. These qualities have been constantly seen even by his friends into a want of due severity as firmness; but the criticism can not stand in view of the remarkable position with the Church party in Mexico, his resolute confronting of the Pope, he himself being a devout Catholic, and the singular wisdom with which, in cases requiring great judgment, he has from the first mingled determination with forbearance. He fully understands that Mexico requires the infusion of a new blood into her listless, apathetic population, and for that reason he encourages the immigration of foreigners, whether from Europe or America, to throw open the resources of the superb country he is trying to regenerate. He wants about him men of energy, activity, and ideas; and no one going to Mexico with plans for the development of its resources need fear being neglected by this energetic, far-seeing ruler.

THE EMPRESS CARLOTTA.

RAILWAY COLLISION NEAR JAMAICA, L. I. AUGUST 28, 1865.—SKETCHED ON THE SPOT BY MICHAEL J. PERLAN.—[SEE NEWS COLUMN.]

On being introduced to him the stranger is at once placed at his ease, and in every way encouraged to freely advance his ideas, and to explain whatever theories or inventions he may have for the improvement of Mexico. In a few minutes the applicant finds that he is conversing with one who can appreciate worth and who knows the value of men.

The Empress CHARLOTTE (or CARLOTTA, as she is called in Mexico) is not yet twenty-four years of age. She is tall, graceful, well dignified, and eminently distingue in appearance. A cousin of Queen VICTORIA, daughter of LEOPOLD King of Belgium, and grand-daughter of LOUIS PHILIPPE, she has moved from childhood among the most illustrious persons and cultivated intellects of Europe. These opportunities, added to a high order of natural talent for art and study, have developed a truly beautiful woman—a lady of splendid attainments, educated to the realization of all the ennobling sentiments which should befit a princess, and imbued with a fervent sense of the responsibilities of the position she has come to fill. Her numberless charities, extending into the humblest walks of life, have endeared her name to thousands of the recipients of her bounty, poured with munificent hand not from the imperial treasury, but from her own resources.

The expression of the face of the Empress is exceedingly winning and amiable, but with a slight trace of haughtiness not unbecoming her exalted position. The idea of ambition and the aspiration to noble deeds is plainly conveyed in the countenance, and this is in keeping with the real character of CARLOTTA; for not MAXIMILIAN himself, with all his energy and enthusiasm, exceeds his talented consort in the desire to be the agent of placing Mexico politically on a level with the vast resources of the country.

The residence of the Emperor is divided between the palace in the capital fronting the great plaza and the castle (now palace) of Chapultepec. This latter is two hour miles from the city, and near the town of Tacubaya. Long before the era of that wonderful civilization which CORTEZ found flourishing in the sixteenth century, Chapultepec was the palace and burial-place of the kings of the still more ancient Toltecs—that mysterious race whom the Aztecs, descending from the north, found and conquered in the Middle Ages, and whose vast monuments are still the marvel of the traveler.

The Aztec kings, of whom the unhappy MONTEZUMA was the last, made this one of their favorite places of resort. The descendants of the Spanish conquerors, destroying these Indian structures, erected the present castle of Chapultepec, which served a variety of purposes through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, until, in 1847, in our Mexican war, it was made a stand-point against the invaders. The glorious victories of Chapultepec and Molino del Rey, near by, will always rank among the most splendid achievements of American arms. In both instances the Mexican forces, far outnumbering ours, were safely ensconced behind stone-walls, and within apparently impregnable intrenchments, but they could not resist the impetuous onset of the Anglo-Saxon. MAXIMILIAN has greatly improved and beautified Chapultepec, where a large number of workmen, gardeners, and builders are constantly employed.

The White Compound.

"It was early in the spring of 1855 that this comp. was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a distressing cough. I had for some months been engaged in the preparation having for its basis the inside bark of the pine tree, and it occurred to me that it might be used in diseases of the throat and lungs. The success of it in the case of my friend encouraged a small quantity of the medicine that I had been preparing, and I sold it to my neighbors. The demand was exceedingly gratifying. Within ten days the original quantity was exhausted. Soon after this I sent out to the public generally, and after this I sent out to the public generally, and for some weeks from a bad cough, occasioned by a cold or settling on the throat or lungs, would be soon found relief, and rest for more. The sale began to increase rapidly. J. L. Clarke, Esq., Editor of the Manchester Daily Mirror, made a trial of it for some months, and was so delighted with it that he became immediately. He was so highly pleased with the result that he not only gave it a recommendation, but published before the public, that he finally persuaded me to put it up in quantities for the public sale. This was done in November, 1853, I first advertised it under the name of White Pine Compound. In the spring of 1854 I came here and ben wholesaled in Manchester alone one hundred dollars' worth of it. Since that time it has grown in reputation, and it still maintains that position. There is no mistake about it. It is very soothing and healing in its nature, a warning to the stomach, and adapted in child to the most delicate female."

"As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled. It is a well known fact in that purpose; but a person in using it for a cough was not only cured of the cough, but was relieved of a kidney difficulty of ten years' standing. Since that accidental discovery many persons have used it for the same complaint, and have been completely cured."

The above extract was first issued in 1860. Since then, as in Manchester, the White Pine Compound has taken the lead of all Cough remedies, as well as preparations for the cure of Kidney difficulties, in every city, town, and village throughout America, and in Foreign Countries.

This remedy is as safe and pleasant to take as it is effectual.

THE MEETING IN RICHMOND.

We publish on page 580 a sketch, by Mr. J. R. HAMILTON, of the mass meeting of the citizens of Richmond, held on August 29, in the beautiful Capitol grounds of that city. The object of the meeting was ostensibly to give a denial to the imputations so frequently made, in the press of the North, that the loyalty of the people of Virginia, in spite of their protestations, is but of a sullen, discontented, and ephemeral nature. Judge WILLIAM H. LYONS presided at the meeting, which adopted a series of resolutions expressive of the people's unfeigned loyalty and devotion to the Union; and speeches were made by Judge LYONS, R. T. DANIEL, late Prosecuting-Attorney for the Commonwealth, W. H. MACFARLAND, President of the late Farmers's Bank, and the Hon. JAMES LYONS, member of the late Confederate Congress.

The meeting, although large (there may have been some 500 or 600 present, a large number of whom were colored), was not by any means either as numerous or enthusiastic as might have been desired, considering that the occasion was one of the most important that ever convened the citizens of Richmond together; and, looking to the objects proposed, it was a circumstance to be regretted. On the platform, however, were many of the most prominent men of the city and State, and nearly all the leading members of the press, under whose auspices the whole movement may be said to have been inaugurated. At the conclusion of the meeting a committee of three—Messrs. W. H. MACFARLAND, ROBERT RIDGWAY, and CHARLES PALMER—were appointed to present the resolutions to President JOHNSON, and to request him to visit the city of Richmond.

The large central building against which the speaker's platform was erected is the celebrated Capitol, containing the Senate Chamber, the House of Representatives, and all the various offices so recently occupied by the Confederate Government. The view presented being from the beautifully wooded grounds of the Governor's mansion, the latter is, of course, not visible. To the right of the picture is seen CRAWFORD'S celebrated bronze statue of WASHINGTON, with its base surrounded by some of Virginia's great men, also in bronze. The church beyond with the tall steeple is St. Paul's, the Episcopal church which JEFFERSON DAVIS usually attended, and where he was seated when he received the telegram from General LEE, announcing that all further resistance was useless. Down in the hollow, to the left of the picture, is seen the upper part of the Custom-house, in which is also at present located the Post-office, the National Bank of Virginia, and the First National Bank of Richmond. Although the Capitol grounds are not spacious, and are not at present in the fine order in which they were formerly kept, few cities in the world possess a spot in their midst more attractive and full of natural beauty.

The meeting at Richmond, while it shows that many prominent citizens of Virginia have sufficient common-sense to see the folly of secession, does not materially alter the situation as presented in the late election. We can not expect that the ideas of Virginians or of the citizens of any other Southern State are to be reversed by their defeat on the battle-field. We have now to oppose in politics the very heresy which we have defeated in a hundred severe battles. We have settled conclusively the question whether the union of States shall be maintained. But there remains much yet to be settled in regard to the prerogatives of the several States as related to the General Government. The English Revolution was not consummated by the victories of Cromwell and the decapitation of Charles the First, but in the peaceful victory of the English people forty years later, when William of Orange succeeded James the Second. Fortunately for us the Slave Power can have no restoration: with the removal of the cause of our troubles our future is ultimately secure.

THE COURT-ROOM IN WHICH CAPTAIN WIRZ, THE ANDERSONVILLE JAILER, IS BEING TRIED AT WASHINGTON.—[SEE PAGE 582.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1865.

CONCILIATION.

A MEETING of certain citizens of Richmond lately adopted a resolution severely censuring the efforts made by some persons at the North "to brand the people of the South with perfidy and insincerity." In the same strain Mr. R. A. ALSTON, of Georgia, who frankly declares himself to have been "an earnest rebel," and "under the same circumstances would feel in honour and duty bound to act as I have done," but who has now taken the oath "with an honest purpose to keep it," writes to the New York Tribune denouncing as cruel, false, and pernicious the public correspondence which the late rebel States, which represents the late rebels as sulking or meditating further trouble. The Southern man who writes as Mr. ALSTON declares to be probably mean or malignant; the Northern man who does it is either duped or hired. Mr. ALSTON gives these facts, the truth, as he claims, of wide and general knowledge, upon his sacred honor. We find similar statements in many journals in our own neighborhood. There is declared to be a spirit among somewhat loyal men averse to conciliation; and the Democratic Conventions, whose regard for humanity is recorded in our political history of the last thirty years, have taken brotherly love under their especial protection.

In some cases this paper has been signalized as the chief of sinners in this matter. Thus the Mobile Daily News, a "Union" paper established in that city upon its occupation by the national forces, is quite certain that we are not more "conciliatory," calls Harper's Weekly "a vile print," declares that it "outHerods Herod in its efforts to make the white man to a social equality with the negro;" and in the ancient style of the days when "Union man" was a political crime in the city of Mobile, and every faithful citizen in the land was expected to shudder at the crack of the chivalric whip, it concludes: "This infamous miscegenation print is doing every thing in its power to nourish and perpetuate whatever bad feeling may still exist between the North and South, and a spirit of agreement among Southern news-dealers not to sell it nor have any thing to do with it would be a most excellent step."

The New Orleans Picayune is also implied to denounce our paper as "an incendiary publication," while the New Orleans South, a new journal of "Unionism" like that of the Mobile News, declares that "the infamy of this sheet [Harper's Weekly] culminates in its issue of the 5th instant [August]." The excellent South proceeds to describe a wood-cut in that number, and characterizes General LEE as "great and good," and speaks of the late rebel citizens of the United States as "a people" whom the brave and good and noble every where respect and admire for their "sacrifices, endurance, and heroism." The South concludes in unison with the Mobile News: "This vile, negro-equality, miscegenating sheet should never again be received into any respectable Southern family. We trust our newsmen will repudiate it." And with the News the South calls upon the news-dealers not to send it any longer. "It sinks on the table."

This kind of thing is ludicrously stale. We have heard exactly the same phrases for the last twenty years when any profession of faith was made in the principles of the Declaratory Government. But while this is familiar enough in the quarter from which it comes there is something else not so familiar in that quarter, and which shows one of the radical and irreclaimable results achieved by the war. In the same city of New Orleans there is actually a perfectly free press and free speech. If they are maintained the future is secure. That they may be maintained is our present hope and effort. And because of that effort and effort this journal is distasteful to the courteous and conciliatory Mobile News and New Orleans Picayune and South.

The New Orleans Tribune replies to the South, and quietly remarks: "Legal publications like Harper's Weekly, battling for the cause of justice and equal rights, now circulate all over the South. The 'incendiary publications' of former days are now the recognized, proper, and patriotic publications which the masses seek, and are found in every good household. But there are also in circulation many disloyal, incendiary papers edited by secessionists, which keep up a spirit of mischief. They should be looked after by the authorities. [We hope the authorities are not trouble them.—Ed. H. W.] So long as they refuse to recognize the result of the late war, and are permitted to be published in the interests of slavery and treason, there is no peace." Let them say their say, say we. But let perfect freedom of speech be protected at every cost.

This is rather a long text for a short sermon upon this matter of conciliation. "Do you wish to grind us in the dust?" asks Mr. ALSTON. "Are we to drink the bitter dregs of defeat and humiliation?" demands somebody else. Certainly not, if we can help it; but are we? Has this war—we ask Mr. ALSTON or any other intelligent, honest rebel—been a friendly tilt or tournament? Has it been a pleasant feat of arms, and, the Queen of Beauty having awarded the crown, are we now to seat ourselves at the fragrant feast, each outdoing the other in mannerly self-sacrifice? What are the facts? The people of the United States, by a tremendous struggle, have saved their Government and their national existence from a prolonged and bloody rebellion. They have now but one, although a very comprehensive question to answer—how to secure the results of their victory? The citizens who are defeated—Mr. ALSTON, for instance—believed in the right of secession; believed that the separation was a sovereign; that the Constitution is a mere treaty between independent powers. That is to say, they held views incompatible with the peaceful existence of the Government. Mr. ALSTON says that they still hold them, every jot and tittle, but have been unable in this contest to maintain them.

Is it not then the business of the people of the United States to take care that they never can be maintained? Is it not our duty to the defeated citizens as well as to ourselves to prevent any future delusion that the attempt to maintain them will be crowned with better success? If a man who really believed Mr. ALSTON to be an assassin, who long lay in wait for him, and at last sprang upon him, and was thrown off only after a fierce struggle, should say as he fell, "I can't help it, I submit because you are stronger, but I do still think you an assassin," Mr. ALSTON would smile as if it were only a merry bout, and say, "Well, my friend, get ready and try it again;" or would he say, "By Heaven, I do justice to your feeling and your strength. I have had hard tussle, and I should be a fool not to take some security for your good behavior." Then if the aggressor should say, "You scoundrel, why don't you conciliate me? If you want to have peace, just let me alone;" would not Mr. ALSTON reply, "By all means, and suppose it naturally not of the sweetest just now. I don't wonder at it. I don't blame you for it. But for all that I must have my rights"?

The Richmond resolutions, Mr. ALSTON himself, and others, thus say, "But we have accepted the results of the war!" Is that true? If you have, we shall be the happiest nation on earth before New-Year. The bells rang and Wall Street sang psalms when Richmond fell. But if you have accepted the results in no way, as you say, such a Thanksgiving was never dreamed of as we shall have in November. What are the results of the war? Reconstruction; the destruction of the doctrine of State sovereignty; and perfect liberty of speech and press throughout the country. Have you accepted them? Mr. JOHNSON says that the Government has fought the doctrine of State sovereignty, has conquered it, has made itself supreme, and the slave free. But he adds in italics, "This is not our end, our will, our belief." He then says that the late rebels "never will" mean to disturb the Government. Why not, if they believe it wrong? And if they really wish not to disturb it, will they not willingly join us in making disturbance impossible? Their presence, with a heartily professed hostility still existing, is not acceptance.

Where do we find proof of acceptance? The Southern Methodist Episcopal Church on the Northern Church on the ground of slavery Slavery is abolished by the war. Does the Southern Church accept the result? On the contrary it refuses specifically to ask and if we expect men to renounce in a day the cherished convictions of years? Certainly not. It is precisely what we not only do not expect, but what we know to be impossible, and there fore we ask in turn why we should be expected to act as the Southern Church? The hostility of the United States is no longer openly resisted by arms in the late rebel States. Those States are exhausted. Their people are struggling to live. Our own sense of justice prompts us all to sympathize with the sorrows of others. But we still ask whether this passivity can be regarded as acceptance of the result of the war, as the Richmond resolutions claim, without which there will be endless trouble? Because the pity our fellow-citizens feel for them is simso terrible a war, and who have suffered so bitterly, we must not assume that all danger is forever past. There is surely no vindictiveness in demanding the plighted word even of common sense. There is certainly no disposition to humiliate fellow-citizens into the dust in exacting of them plain words of peace, loyal and humane. Surely we have the right to defend ourselves against those who declare that they hold views which are subversive of whatever the Government, when they are still panting with the fierce effort to inforce those views by arms. It would be the very madness of folly to offer them the political means of securing a result to which their military power was inadequate.

Must oaths be accepted as a sufficient pledge? But what more solemn oaths are possible than those which the leaders of the rebellion have violated, a violation which they justified by doctrines which they still hold? The first question is the last: have we no right to secure the results of our victory? Because rebels have surrendered, has all our authority to prevent the ill consequences of rebellion ceased? If so, the President had no right to appoint a single Provisional Governor, nor to demand emancipation as a precedent condition of reorganization. If, in the present condition of the State of Georgia, that State alone has the right of Regulating Suffrage, the President has assumed powers utterly unwarranted, for he has forbidden thirteen classes of persons to vote who are permitted to vote in the State. He was guided in his action by his convictions of the requirements of the public safety. If in his judgment that safety would permit him to authorize the colored citizens to vote, he would have had exactly the same right to do it. If it shall prove that those whom he empowered exclusively to vote can not be trusted to do so compatibly with the national security, he will take such further steps as that security demands.

That is the whole question of the case. Resolutions about State rights do not change it. If our defeated fellow-citizens spontaneously offer the pledges of security every honest man will rejoice. If they do not, those pledges are none the less essential to the settlement of the country, and will none the less rigorously be required.

HOW SHALL WE SAVE OUR SELVES?

MR. OLIVER CHARLICK, the President of the Long Island Railroad, upon which a frightful and wonderful accident to a person was recently committed, says that the Company do not station a signal-man at the curve where the slaughter took place because they do not think it necessary to do so. We trust that the public will let Mr. OLIVER CHARLICK understand, in the most emphatic manner, that it does think a signal-man necessary at that point. The fearful and bloody experience of the last year shows that railroad presidents and directors will spend money if they think it necessary to take the most common and obvious precautions to insure the safety of travelers; and it also shows that travelers are a weakly good-humored way of submitting to the most perilous irregularities, to the most filthy and wretched accommodations, and often to the most insolent manners.

It is clear that if the law and public opinion do nothing to right railway passengers they will right themselves. We are a tame public in such matters, but at last people will not consent to have their wives and children and friends cruelly mangled by Mr. OLIVER CHARLICKS who do not think it necessary to take plain precautions. The passengers by a railroad train will constitute themselves a Committee for their own safety. The officers of the law should lose no time in bringing these railroad offenders to justice. There have been at least twelve or fifteen railroad passengers killed and wounded upon the railroads in this country during the last eight months, and not a single offender for any of them is known, has been made to answer. People open their papers every morning with the wonder, "Who has been killed now?" There is a species of newspaper despatch which appears to be composed of railroad slaughters. Let every reader bring it home to himself. Let him imagine that he sees his wife's, his son's, his child's name in the list of massacred—and then reads that upon the inquest over the ravaged body some Mr. OLIVER CHARLICK announces that he does not take precautions because he does not consider them to be necessary.

Let the responsibility be brought home to the officers of the road. Let proper information be instructed by public indignation that when they buy roads, or are put into presidencies and directorships, they have assumed duties which they will be compelled to fulfill. When a catastrophe occurs let us have the names of the chief officers of the road printed throughout the country. Public and respectable men will be averse to having their names associated with reckless murders. Let the Legislature require that the safety rules of all roads shall be conspicuously posted in every car and at every station, so that in case of delay or accident passengers may know exactly how what to expect and what provision has been made for the contingency. In case of delay at stations let the fact and the name of the conductor, if he can give no satisfactory explanation, be reported to the Company and to the newspapers. For every limb broken, for every life lost, let a heavy pecuniary settlement be required. Money will not restore the dead, nor cure deformity, nor console lingering and mortal injury; but it will diminish dividends, and when they stop stockholders will snarl. Damaged can ruin profits, and Mr. OLIVER CHARLICKS buy and run railroads, or preside over their reckless management, because they find that money is to be made out of them.

The truth is, that the great public thoroughfares of this country need a thorough reorganization. Their first and obvious purpose is the safe transport of passengers, and that is the last consideration in the minds of the managers. The consequence is, that in no civilized country is travel so dangerous as in this. A man shall go from London to Rome with less peril than from New York to Boston, or Washington, or Chicago. Our daily slaughter-roll justifies the sneer, that the model republic holds human life cheap; and while it proclaims human rights, manifests the most sublime indifference to the fundamental right of all.

This is entirely unnecessary. Disorder and disregard of life should be no more characteristic of a republic than of a despotism; and they would cease if public opinion should be arrayed indignantly against such horrible events as those with which all hearts are now aching. Let the Mr. OLIVER CHARLICKS, who do not think it necessary to station flagmen at dangerous places, learn from the treatment they receive from those who are brought in daily contact with them that they are held utterly responsible for all avoidable accidents upon the roads they direct, and for such fatal and criminal irregularity as now appears to have long prevailed upon the Long Island Railroad.

THE FALL TRADE.

We are in September, and it is now safe to say that the fall trade of the city of New York will be the largest ever known. The country is buying goods in unprecedented quantities, at prices not far below those of the period when gold was at par. Payment is being generally made in cash; where credits are given they are short. Western men, from every State, arrive in the city with wallets stuffed with greenbacks and national currency. Even the latter such large amounts have been brought to town that the banks are inconvenienced, and are pushing up in bundles and sending it west for redemption. There is hardly a branch of general trade that is not unusually active and prosperous. The dry-goods and hardware dealers are not keep any stock on hand; though the importations and the product of the factories are unprecedented; the produce men are as busy as bees; there is a demand for all the paper, cotton, sugars, and spices that can be pushed through the custom-house, without once going to look for a purchaser. Not even in the height of the war, when any thing was deemed better than money, was the trade of New York city more active or more profitable.

Nor is the South far behind the West in our markets. Notwithstanding all that has been said about the poverty of the South, purchasers from that section are arriving every day, and all seem able to pay for what they want. Of course, merchants are not over-anxious to sell on credit to those who made the rebellion an excuse for cheating their Northern creditors. But every one is willing to sell for cash; and this, or cotton, which amounts to the same thing, Southern buyers seem to possess to an amount entirely unexpected. Even to places which were overrun by SHERMAN, in his great march, goods have been sent and for cash within the past months for hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the money paid in greenbacks. One little store at Wilmington, North Carolina, established by Northern men, is selling $3000 of goods a day—all for cash or cotton.

A curious illustration of the effect of the war is afforded by the names of the purchasers which are making trade for the South. Before the war the chief commodities required for the South were luxuries, such as wines, silks, wines, jewels, etc., on the one hand, and the coarser kind of dry goods and farm implements on the other. Now the South is taking no jewels, no silks or wines, and but small quantities of the class of dry goods formerly used for the wear of slaves; but there is no limit to the Southern demand for the quality of dry goods such as Northern mechanics use, for groceries, and for every description of tools and machinery. The entire stock of the New York jobbers, who are making themselves felt in the market, say planter and slave removed.

When we last spoke of the probable quantity of cotton to come forward from the South, we mentioned that the best-informed men estimated the stock on hand at 1,500,000 bales. It is now clear that this estimate was considerably short of the truth. But it was so generally received that the price has been maintained; and if the South have only that quantity, this quantity will not its owners more money than was ever before realized for a single crop. A bale of cotton will now buy fifteen barrels of flour instead of five as formerly; five barrels of sugar instead of 1½; twice as much dry goods and three as much hard or tin ware as it used.

No one is drawing attention to the emigration from the North to the South. Yet it is a very remarkable feature of the times. Before the war the Charleston and Savannah steamers charged $15 and $20 for cabin passages, and did a light business. Now, the charge is $50 for cabin and $25 for steerage, and the steamers sail so full that to secure a passage application must be made several days beforehand. A similar increase of business is reported on the railroads running south through Ohio and Kentucky.

Nor is this at all to be wondered at. A compotent mechanic—printer, bricklayer, carpenter, mason, engineer, weaver, shoemaker, tailor, baker, blacksmith, tinsmith, or miller—are now command wages in the South more than double the average of past years. We risk nothing in saying that competent carpenters, shipwrights, blacksmiths, masons, and millers can obtain steady employment in any Southern State at not less than $10 a day. Common day laborers are not wanted. Negroes abound to do work which requires no preliminary education. But skilled labor is in such demand that the laborers can dictate terms. Every railroad-bridge, culvert, and station at the South requires rebuilding. Many towns are in the same condition. And the people stand in no position of timy which will labor can produce; and have the means, in the shape of cotton, to pay for what they want.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AMERICA.

THE war in South America seems to be very imperfectly understood. Even the London Spectator, one of the best of the Liberal journals, speaks as if the Dictator of Paraguay were probably very much abused; and in other quarters we remark appeals to the sympathy of republicans for the same personage, who is doubtless the most absolutely despotic ruler in any country on the globe which claims to be civilized.

A gentleman who knows well the history and actual conditions of those regions, of which the world is generally very ignorant, writes that, during the last fifty-four years, Paraguay has had three absolute despots. Its House of Representatives meets four days out of five. The Dictator LOPEZ is the sole foreign trader in the country. Paraguay is his plantation. It is a penal offense to undertake commerce or to sell produce to any buyer but the Government, which is LOPEZ. Foreigners are excluded almost as rigorously as from Japan. And in a population of about a million the Dictator maintains a standing army of some sixty thousand men, effected in part by skilful forcing of native youth. The country is virtually inaccessible by land, and is flanked by the Paraguay and Parana rivers.

There is naturally no love lost between such a country and its neighbors, the most powerful of which is Brazil. Brazil is a monarchy, but "it is republicanism itself compared with Paraguay." A Government of Paraguay is the irresponsible will of one man. The representatives of Brazil meet annually. There are local Legislatures in the provinces. The executive of the Empire are regulated by the representatives, and there is perfect liberty of the press. The Argentine Republic is the next most important neighbor of Paraguay. It lies below it upon the River De la Plata, and is a mild and liberal and progressive state. Its institutions are modeled upon those of the United States, including entire freedom of speech and the press. Uruguay, at the mouth of the River De la Plata, is the third and smallest neighbor—a province which was freely relinquished by the Argentine Republic, to which it formerly belonged.

These three States are now leagued in a war with Paraguay. The facts of its beginning are very simple. Brazil and Paraguay were at peace, when a Brazilian steamer was seized in the port of Assumption, the capital of Paraguay. This outrage was followed by an invasion of the Brazilian province of Matto Grosso. Paraguay asked leave to cross the territory of the Argentine Republic to attack Brazil, which was at peace with the republic. The request was necessarily refused. Paraguay then seized two Argentine men-of-war and invaded the Argentine province of Corrientes, driving from it its Paraguay a million head of cattle, which are the riches of the republic, and declaring it annexed to Paraguay. The war thus begun by LOPEZ was then accepted by Brazil and the Argentine Republic, and Uruguay has joined the alliance with a small contingent. The first advantage was naturally with Paraguay. But the great result of the struggle has been the annihilation of the Paraguayan navy by the Brazilian fleet.

Upon such facts it is folly to claim the sympathy of civilization for the stern and solitary despotism of Paraguay; and it is unpardonable to represent the war as a struggle between monarchy and republicanism. Paraguay is actually and in spirit the least republican State upon the continent, while Brazil and the Argentine Republic, upon all the world, are constantly advancing in liberal civilization.

OLD TIMES AND NEW.

WHEN the papers announce each morning that the United States Sub-treasury at New York has a balance of sixty millions, few readers realize the financial revolution whose accomplishment those figures indicate. In the old times—we call them old times, though they are only five years ago—a balance of $25,000,000 in the Sub-treasury was deemed so enormous that Congress was called upon to legislate for the relief of the community, and the Treasury Department was actually authorized to buy up United States bonds at 126 in order to deplete the Treasury vaults. Now, Mr. VAN DYKE steps quietly on a balance of thirty millions in gold and as much in currency, and nobody troubles his head about it.

In the old times, when paper-money—not a legal tender—reached $200,000,000, financial authorities warned us that we were going headlong to destruction, and that such an inflation must lead to a collapse. Now, we have $1,000,000,000 of paper-money afloat, and yet the money market tightens up periodically; the TREASURY DEPARTMENT more legal tenders; and Congress is going to be asked to authorize a further issue of $300,000,000 national currency for the benefit of our Southern brethren.

In the old times, when Government or the Erie Railroad wanted a loan of five or ten millions, the money market and Wall Street went into convulsions at the announcement, and for days and weeks every body was busy calling in loans, realizing on stocks, and preparing for the terrible "liquidation." Now, Government borrows twelve to fifteen millions a week for months together, and nobody is disturbed by the operation.

In the old times, when the Secretary of the Treasury drew a check in favor of the Mexican Minister for seven or eight dollars in payment of the Mexican indemnity claim, the newspapers were full of nothing else, and the descriptions of Mr. ALEXANDER and the way he presented his check and was blandly asked by Mr. CISCO whether "his carts were at the door to carry off the money" were very amusing. Newspaper Secretaries of the Treasury check for ten millions several times a week, and nobody asks when or how the checks are paid.

In the old times specie was in Wall Street bought or sold fifty shares of stock, and when a broker had an order for 1000 shares his confrères gained over him, and he was the lion of the day. Now, it is almost impossible to buy fifty shares of any thing, as even the smallest operators deal in hundred-share lots; and many a street broker has a desk and no standing, buys and sells 10,000 shares in a morning without attracting any remark.

If the last five years have made such changes, what may be expected of the next five?

HAYTI.

WE trust that our readers did not fail to ponder the article in one of our latest Numbers upon HAYTI. It was written by Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT, whose official relations and private acquaintance and residence in the island peculiarly fit him for the task. Upon the whole, the country has been the object of more passionate criticism or of falser representation. Especially in our own country during the long and fierce dominance of the slave-power, its history was perverted to the basest purpose. As the Saracen mothers were accustomed to subdue their children to docility by telling them the English King Richard, so the fears of peaceful citizens were aroused by allusions to the horrors of St. Domingo. That was always the last desperate appeal against the incontrovertible argument of the anti-slavery movement. "These fanatics are preparing the way for the horrors of St. Domingo," was the cry raised against intelligent, peaceful, and sagacious citizens by those who were plotting a bloody rebellion, and who were preparing the way for the horrors of Andersonville.

The truth is, that "the horrors o' St. Domingo" were a natural uprising of the slave to re-enslave an emancipated class. They were the terrible protest against the treachery of the race that called itself superior. They were another form of the protest that nothing is so dangerous as plain injustice. If the whites had kept faith with the blacks those horrors would have been impossible.

The history of Hayti has been profoundly sad. The descent from the sagacious administration of TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE to the brutal and stupid tyranny of SOULOUQUE was full of tragedy and cruelty. In the empire of SOULOUQUE, as Mr. REDPATH remarks, pure barbarism and civilization met face to face. Since 1858, GEFFRARD, the present President, overthrew the savage element and succeeded to power. He ordered and organized an army. He encouraged education. He established, for the first time, a school for girls, and asked the Pope to send whom he would select to enjoy the sanctity of marriage, and aimed at a modeling of the courts and of the administration of the laws. In short, GEFFRARD did all that he could, and not doing, could not attempt to reconcile the mulattoes and blacks, who are ancient enemies in Hayti. During his Presidency the educational system was more established with the United States, and GEFFRARD sent his personal friend, Colonel ROMAIN, as minister to Washington, a gentleman of liberal education and of the most polished and agreeable manners. Mr. REDPATH describes GEFFRARD as too gentle a ruler to deal with the savage opposition which he must necessarily encounter, and which has now taken arms and plunged into revolution.

The insurrection is led by TURNB SALNAVE and FRANÇOIS JEAN JOSEPH, and is a revolt of barbarism against civilization—of the spirit and purpose of SOULOUQUE against those of TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE. Thus far the rebels have made little progress. There are frequent rumors of their success; but so far as appears they are still confined to Cape Haytien, where they are besieged by the national forces. It is possible that GEFFRARD may be compelled to resign, and that a stronger hand and more iron will-power will be summoned to lead the party of progress and civilization. Or the event of war may throw the supreme power again into the hands of SOULOUQUE. If the latter should be the result, it can be merely temporary, and will last only until the sims of intelligent and civilized Haytiens find an adequate leader.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN IN SOUTH AMERICA.

WE received a few days since an account of the solemn obsequies in memory of Mr. LINCOLN performed by the Archbishop of Buenos Ayres in Alexandria, in Egypt, and we are now informed that M. DE SARMIENTO, the Minister in this country of the Argentine Republic, an accomplished gentleman, a correspondent and friend of the late HORACE MANN, is preparing a Life of President LINCOLN in the Spanish language. M. BARTOLOMÉ MITRE, the son of the President of the Argentine Republic and an attaché of the Legation, has translated the poem by WHITTIER, "In Memoriam Mr. LINCOLN was so fond and which he repeated to Mr. CARPENTER—"Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?" We should be glad to reproduce it here did not our limited space absolutely forbid. But those who are familiar with the language will appreciate how the spirit of the translation from these two stanzas:

> "Debil mortal! en qué fundas
> Con tu orgullo!
> Cuál es la causa ostensible
> De tu mente vanidosa,
> Será que ignoras acaso
> Que todas las grandezas
> O cual veloz mudable
> Sombra ó la eternidad?

> "Del roble y sauce las hojas
> Mustias se ven y abatidas;
> Van por el aire esparcidas
> Y undas a tierra van!
> Así de los mortales el destino!
> Pobre, rico, débil, fuerte,
> Todos han de caer,
> Igual tumba cubrirá."

It is an interesting fact for us just now that M. MITRE was for some time a private in a company of the Buenos Ayres National Guard, of which the Captain was a Mr. ANDERSON, formerly a servant in the house of M. MITRE's father. Under this Captain he took part in the gallant action at Cepeda, which was a battle of liberation. In the service of the Argentine Republic there are two battalions composed almost entirely of colored soldiers, and a colored Colonel, who is also a member of the National House of Representatives.

The "inexplicable" fancy of an educated South American for brave and honorable men of a different race seems in this instance to have disappeared altogether. Apparently the honorable Spanish Americans, also, we shall not be surprised if it becomes likewise extinct.

LITERARY.

"Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East" (HARPER & BROTHERS) is just issued for the fourth year. The great throng of American travelers should not leave home without it; for in the space of six hundred well-printed pages they will find an itinerary of travel through Europe and the East corrected to 1865, and logically and clearly arranged to give the utmost information in the smallest compass. There is no other yearly issue of any European work upon it, and the publishers intend to issue this every year as complete as it can be made. The great advantage of a book of this kind, covering the whole ground, giving the essential information and advice founded upon experience, and thus conveniently bound in flexible covers, is obvious. It saves the traveler a library of hand-books. There is a short skeleton tour added of travel in the Holy Land, with a brief description of the chief cities and places of interest. But we can not say that it is a fact deserving a place in such a Hand-Book that the lovely village on Mount Washington upon the Hudson is the property of JAMES GORDON BENNETT, Esq.—or as we agree with the London Times, "the masterly genius of LEE, who controlled the destinies of the Confederate armies," will help to make West Point "forever famous in history," except as the same region is made famous by the "traitor ARNOLD," as the author calls the last General, who had doubtless a much more masterly military genius than LEE. ROBERT E. LEE will not be remembered by West Point but by Andersonville. The slanderous thrust against his name mentioned in the same sentence and with higher praise than GRANT and MEADE. These, however, are puffs which do not destroy the intrinsic value of the Hand-Book, which is written with express reference to the wants of American travelers, and whose great popularity is the highest practical proof of its value.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE NEW JERSEY DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

THE Democratic Convention of New Jersey met at Trenton August 30. General RONGON was chosen candidate for Governor. Resolutions were adopted declaring the failure of the rebellion to Northern citizens, strongly favoring State rights, opposing negro suffrage, military arrests and trials, and pronouncing the national debt a national disgrace.

PROSTRATION OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Charleston Daily News thus depicts the commercial prostration of South Carolina and Charleston:

"It will not be surprising to our readers, in and out of the state, to learn that the assessed valuation of the city is record now. Of $18,000,000 in bank stock all is lost. Of $5,000,000 in railroads the market value is not more than twenty per cent. Of three hundred companies not ther can evaluate hundred, $20,000,000 in interests no dividends can be expected. Of five thousand houses in Charleston fifteen hundred have been burned, and others almost irreparably damaged. Of estates of slaves and miners, and of property in litigation, four-fifths are represented by Confederate securities, and are therefore valueless. Of our many merchants, lately of large capital and unblemished credit, few have assets to pay the small debts against them at the beginning of the war, of the many large and valuable estates in Beaufort district and the adjacent islands all have been confiscated, and many have been sold for taxes. Of the large cotton estates still further from the coast, few have been abandoned. Of the cotton on hand at the beginning, and during the war, every one possessing it is now at least $20,000,000, the larger portion has been taken or destroyed. Of the household furniture, plate, pictures, elements, utensils, and furniture, and silverware, all but an inconsiderable amount have been consumed, damaged, or taken. Of the money in the hands of our citizens at the commencement of the war, or accruing from the sale or property, or the practice of professions, or the payment of debts, all has been invested in securities of the rejected States. Of the whole population of the State not one-fifth has ever possessed a dollar. Of the funds of the colleges, charitable institutions, and societies, all else, or nearly all, have been sunk. Of the bank of the State not held by the Government little has any market value. Of the State Capitol and of ruin has also been made the value of four hundred thousand slaves, estimated a few years since at $400,000,000. And there, therefore, of the $490,000,000 worth of property in this State in 1860 but little more than $50,000,000 are remain."

The cholera is diminishing at Constantinople. There was at last accounts 3000 deaths from the epidemic in England. It is noticed by the London Times, however, that the epidemic differs in its character from those of 1832, 1849, and 1854. Then its line of progress was from India to Persia, and thence through Persia, Asia Minor, Turkey, Russia, Austria, Prussia, North Germany, and England. But this time it appears to have found England its choice as on its route from India. It was first reported, in the strength, in Egypt, and then it raged terribly, spreading along the coast to Damietta, and running up the Nile to Cairo. It was not heard of in the interior of the Isle of Cyprus, at Constantinople, and in the villages on the Bosphorus, but it was reported from Arcona, from Bombay, and Madras, from Malta, from the Ionian Islands and New Orleans. But in no one of these instances had it advanced so far as it has now reached in Europe. In the case of Cairo can hardly be considered an exception. It is but ten years since Lord Aberdeen, then Premier, declared it was very intense. Once there was a story of its appearance in Marseilles, but it was found subsequently to have not advanced beyond Marseilles, or beyond any of the inland ports on the coast of France. In Southern Italy it has been attacked, but only under similar conditions. Where it had appeared it had been found in the cities and—the former a town close upon the coast, the latter a little further inland. Naples, the results of a visit, it can say up to the present moment. The only exception is a report of the mission to Rome, but even there the precautionary measures is reduced to "cholerine," and is apparently only such as should be observed in most southern cities. In short, upon a summary of the evidence, we come to this, that has not appeared in the Mediterranean ports of Europe, but that there has been an extraordinary outbreak of cholera in the valley of the Mediterranean.

Advices regarding the progress of the rebellion in the republic of Hayti are very favorable to the revolutionists, who had taken Fort St. Michael, opposite the town of Cape Haytien, after a compelling of cannon for the bombardment of the latter and the evacuation of Petite Anse by the forces of President GEFFRARD. Reinforcements for the rebels in Cape Haytien are reported, and it is said that those persons are being harassed with the rebels to expand on the streets.

The war in South America progresses slowly. At last accounts there were three grand divisions of the Paraguayan army, each of them advancing and meeting any serious impediment. Each of the three countries of the allies has taken the field. Meanwhile the Argentine Corrientes has been almost laid waste by the invaders. The General in command of Brazil, has been appointed and one of his chief towns taken, and Uruguay has been invaded by a wing of the same force. The war-steamer has been sustained by the Paraguayans in the province of Rio Grande, and has been blockaded on the river by the great naval battle of the 11th ult. was a sad blow to them. As they are so completely cut off from the outside world their naval fall for want of ammunition. They are already beginning to serve in their land service.

THE MASS MEETING HELD AT RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, AUGUST 29, 1865.—SKETCHED BY J. R. HAMILTON.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

OUR BABY-SHOW.—[From Photographs furnished mainly by A. Gardner, Washington.]

THE TRIAL OF CAPTAIN WIRZ.

THE case of Captain WIRZ, charged with the indictment of wanton cruelties upon our soldiers confined under his charge at Andersonville, was opened in the Court of Claims office before the Military Commission at Washington, August 21.

The room of the Court of Claims is large and well furnished. At the end of the room is occupied with a long table, at which sit the members of the Military Commission, with the tables for the counsel and the reporters at the right of the reporter of the Court; while in the other end of the room are a dozen very handsome lounge seats. The room looks out through two large windows into the lively and pleasant park west of the Capitol. At the head of the long table sits Major-General LEW WALLACE, President of the Commission. Next him sits Major-General GERSHAM MOTT, with a prompt, business-like air. Next in order is Brigadier-General LORENZO THOMAS, our Adjutant-General. Still lower down on the right is Brigadier-General E. D. BABCOCK. Last on that side of the table sits Brevet Colonel THOMAS ALCOCK. Next to the President on the left side of the table is General Grant. Then in order sit Brigadier-General FRANCIS FESSENDEN, Brigadier-General BALLIER, and Lieutenant-Colonel J. H. STIBBS. At the foot, and facing General WALLACE, sits the Judge Advocate, Colonel N. P. CHIPMAN. We give an illustration of the court-room on our first page. On page 586 will be found illustrations of the distressing features of our prisoners' life at Andersonville.

At half past 10 A.M. on the 23d, HENRY WIRZ, the prisoner, was brought before the Court. He is a native of Switzerland, about forty years of age, five feet seven inches in height, slender in form, with stooping shoulders and pinched features. His eyes are gray and restless. His counsel were Ex-Judge HUMPHREYS, Governor DENNISON of Florida, CHARLES J. PECK of Illinois, and LOUIS SCHADE of Washington.

The charges and specifications against Captain WIRZ were: 1. Conspiring with ROBERT E. LEE, JAMES A. SEDDON, JOHN H. WINDER, LUCIUS D. NORTHROP, RICHARD B. RHETT, GEORGE WHITE, W. S. WINDER, R. R. STEVENSON, — MOORE, and others to injure the health and destroy the lives of United States soldiers held as prisoners of war by the Confederate States; 2. Murder, in violation of the laws and customs of war.

Under the second charge there are thirteen several specifications.

The trial of the Commission was dissolved, but was again called together on the 24th. The President had ordered that WIRZ alone should be tried, and a new indictment had been made out, having out of the first charge the names of General LEE, JAMES A. SEDDON, LUCIUS D. NORTHROP, and MOORE. Judge ADVOCATE CHIPMAN and Colonel HUGHES gave up his position as counsel. Mr. PECK followed the Judge's example. This produced a sensation in the Court, and the prisoner remonstrated with Mr. PECK, who replied that he could be of no service to the accused, as Judge-Advocate was attorney for the prisoner by law.

On the 24th LOUIS SCHADE and O. H. BAKER appeared as counsel for the prisoner. The prisoner plead "Not guilty." Then the case began for the prosecution. A letter written by the prisoner at Andersonville, May 7, 1865, to General WILSON was offered in evidence. The prisoner, in this letter, plead that, in all that was done at Andersonville, he was only a tool in the hands of his superiors. He says:

I do not think I ought to be held responsible for the shortness of rations, or the overcrowded state of the prison, which was in itself a prolific source of the fearful mortality; for the same reasons applies of clothing, want of shelter, etc., etc. Still I now bear the odium, and not those who were placed there by order of Gen. LEE, and vengeance upon me for what they have suffered, who up until the middle of April kept better care for them in the hands of my superiors.

C. C. GIBBS, once commandant of the post of Camp Sumter at Andersonville, testified to the crowded state of the prison; "it was more like an ant-hill than anything else." At an early period there were only 6000 or 7000 prisoners there; subsequently there were 33,000. He testified to the existence of a "dead line," and to the fact that hounds were employed to track escaped prisoners.

DR. JOHN E. BATES, an assistant rebel surgeon at Andersonville, arrived for duty at that post September 22, 1864, and remained until March 26. On going into a ward of the hospital he "was nathe absolutely. He saw a number of men lying, partially naked, dirty and lousy, in the sand; others were crowded together in small but inconceivable tents. They often asked him for a tea-spoonful of salt, or for some of the siftings from the meal, or for a bone. He perceived the destitute of many destitute, as also of clothing and bedding. There was little fuel. He narrated the story of a young prisoner of fifteen or sixteen years of age, to whom he occasionally brought a potato or a biscuit, and who finally died of gangrene and scurvy; "his sores gangrened, and, from want of food and fuel, he died." It was against the orders to give any thing to the prisoners to help their condition. DR. BATES testified that there were 20,000 or 25,000 prisoners crowded together, of whom from 2000 to 3200 were sick. Many had made holes, or burrows in the earth. The Doctor "saw but little shelter, excepting what ingenuity had devised. He says:

I found them suffering with scurvy, diarrhœa, dysentery, gangrene, pneumonia, and other diseases. When prisoners died they were put in the ground, naked, frequently, I carried off. I don't know how they were buried. The shelters from the hospital was very offensive; if by accident my hands were shrinked I could not go into the hospital without putting a plaster over the affected part. If persons whose systems were reduced by inactive health, purchasing, during a few or scratch the hand, the scurvy put to me was gangrene, so much as to make me

A HYMN.

To Thee, Eternal One,
Ancient of Days,
For this that Thou hast done,
For this time arm has won,
Be endless praise!
Sweet Peace is here; bend from Thy Throne and see
A Nation smiling through her tears at Thee.

America bemoans
Her dead! bleed shed
Above all victor tones
She hears their dying groans—
Her deathless dead!
She hails the dawn of day; but by its light
She sees the wretched havoc of the night.

And yet we praise Thy name,
Father above;
Thou art—though cities flame
And battles rage—the same,
O God of Love!
Rods war awakened us; the noble strife
Aroused us from deep lethargy to life.

Thy fierce north smote this land
Low in the dust;
And now we do not stand,
But kneel, and bless that Hand—
God of our trust!
For henceforth to a nobler life we're called,
"Redeemed, regenerated, disinthralled."

HOW TIME WAS KILLED FOR ME.

My greatest trouble is that I have too much money. My greatest virtue, in one view of it, is that I don't want any more. If the latter fact accounts for my being so lazy, let it go at that.

I am lazy, surely; and ennuied, most of the time, and blasé, and all that sort of thing. I've been the round of the amusements until nothing in that way gives me any satisfaction. It has been suggested to me that it might be a good idea if I would go to work. I may do that yet out of sheer despair.

I go to theatres, and yawn all through the play. I go to balls and soirées, and am disgusted; these girls all know I'm rich. I lolled away a week at Newport in July and bathed once or twice, but what a bore it is to bathe! There's no taking your ease in the water, the surf knocks a fellow about so.

One day last week I had been taking a drive in the Park, and toward evening strolled down Broadway, a thing I never ventured upon, usually. What should I do to kill the time? As I reached Taylor's I glanced in, and remembered with a sigh the delights which I had looked upon the gaudy glories of that big saloon, one evening six or eight years ago, when I was making my first visit to New York, with a party of school-boy friends. That was about a year before I came into my property, you know, and I was as fresh as a daisy.

Stirred by the sweet memory of that happy, impecunious time, I strolled into the saloon and sat down, ordering something to eat and a bottle of wine. While engaged in poking a piece of chicken with a fork, and trying to pretend I enjoyed the wine, I was suddenly surprised at beholding a good-looking middle-aged lady, in a black silk dress, come up to me and sit down opposite at my table.

"This is Mr. Smith, I believe. Isn't it?" said she.

"Not at all," said I; "my name is Jones."

"I say, however," it is St. Clair," but I did not deem it necessary that the woman should know my name.

"Why, I was sure this was Mr. Smith," said she.

"It's all the same," said I; "it's very near it—Jones is. Will you have a glass of wine with me?"

"Sir!" said she, with some asperity.

"I asked you—a glass of wine, you know. It's not the best, but such as it is—"

"Your impertinence will not avail you, Mr. Smith," said the woman; and she gathered up her black silk skirts and left me.

I raised my eyes a trifle, and languidly watched her cross the room as I sipped my wine. She approached a couple of her ladies and one gentleman, and exchanged some observations with them, upon which they all bent an earnest gaze me-ward.

Then they left.

A minute after I strolled out also, and there they all were in a group on the sidewalk, evidently waiting for me. The gentleman—quite a well-appearing chap he was, too—came up to me and said:

"I think Mr. Smith, I will not trouble you."

"It is not," said I; "I am familiar with the name of Smith, but I do not own it."

Then I stepped into the street and lit a cigar. I had just come across a lot of the prettiest Havanas, up town, and had put a whole bunch of them in my pocket.

My friends remained at the door, and I offered the gentleman a cigar, which he courteously declined. The whole group then approached me more closely.

"Certainly, it is Mr. Smith," said a gushing little creature in a blue silk.

"Of course it is," said another gushing little creature in a green silk.

"It is useless for you to deny your name, Mr. Smith; you see we all recognize you perfectly."

"And in case my name was Smith, Sir, why I ask what Smith could do to serve you and your fair companions?"

"A good deal, Sir," said the gentleman; "as much, I believe, Mr. Jones, as two hundred dollars, is it not?"

The lady in the black silk nodded.

"That's not a good deal," said I.

"Then perhaps you'll pay it at once, Mr. Smith, and save further trouble."

"Assuredly I will," said I, "when I owe it."

"Then you mean to deny, Sir," said the gentleman, very deliberately, "that you owe Mrs. Jones here that sum for board; that you left her house on Thursday night last; and carried off besides—quite by mistake, I dare say—a valuable ring belonging to this young lady, Miss Julia Jones?"

I raised my hat to Miss Julia Jones.

"Then I judge," said I, "that I must have been on agreeably intimate terms with this young lady at the time my name was Smith?"

"Was there ever such impertinence!" ejaculated Miss Julia Jones.

"Really, about the hardest case of check I ever saw in my life," said the gentleman, staring curiously at me.

"I beg you good-day, ladies," said I, "and you, Sir."

I strolled up street smoking. They followed me, and presently I felt a policeman's hand laid on my shoulder.

"Beg'r pardon, Sir," said the protector of innocence, "this gentleman directs your arrest."

"Arrest!" said I. "Well, this is interesting. On what charge, pray?"

"Grand larceny," said the gentleman, nodding to the officer.

I blew my cigar nervously. At first I had half a notion to pay these people what they demanded, but on second thought I concluded that would be a little too refreshing.

"These people," said I, "are mistaken in the man. My name is not Smith. It is St. Clair. You may have heard it of."

"Yes, I've heard it often," said the policeman, "it's a werry nice sort o' a name, an' quite a favorite with women—not the sharpest sort, though. It's a gittin' wore out."

"If all the lions was Jones," said the lady in the black silk.

"Oh, be did?" remarked the policeman. "Well, Jones is a mighty common name, too. Don't want him shut up, Sir? It's too late to take him afore the judge now, you know."

"No," said the gentleman; "give him every chance. It is about dinner-time now. We will go to the house and confront him with the other boarders. He can't deny it."

"Since you will have it so, Sir, and ladies," said I, "I suppose I may as well go with you. Especially as I have plenty of leisure. But I prefer to take a carriage, if you do not object—at my expense, of course."

So the policeman, the gentleman, and myself rode to Mrs. Jones's boarding-house in Blanque Street.

We shall take no unfair advantage of you, Mr. Smith," said the gentleman. "You shall enter the dining-room alone. The officer will remain in the hall and listen. If the boarders receive you as a stranger, very well; if not, otherwise."

I obeyed—and entered the dining-room and took a seat at the table.

"I told you so, Sir," said Mr. Smith," said a gentleman in spectacles at my left.

And then the boarders all about the table looked and nodded their acknowledgments.

"It's all right," said the policeman, entering. "Nothing could be snugger. Come on, my man."

"Our mistake," said I, "not yours. Good-by."

I appeal to the ladies and gentlemen here present to scrutinize me with careful eyes. I am not Mr. Smith. There is some mistake. My name is Edward L. St. Clair. Here is my card. I reside at No. — Avenue, and will prove my identity to the most stubborn appreciation."

The male boarders shook their heads. The ladies simpered, and exchanged glances that said, "I did my very best to plainly as you ever did.

"Come along, my gentleman," said the policeman, "you've got to all intents of thing, you know. It won't work. I want you now."

He took me. Nothing easier.

In vain I declared that I had been to my residence—that one or any of my friends be sent for—Judge Carmel, the Reverend Percy Fitzpoot, the Honorable Alsatian Montgomery—all were in vain.

"Don't you want to see Barnum, or Fernando Wood?" queried the officer, sarcastically. "You must think I'm a fool, if you don't. I tell you—"

In the shadow of the falling night he led me away to the Tombs.

I felt quite a chill run over me as I was ushered into the long corridor of that cheerful abode of mirth and festivities. The first thing I found was that there was a man's hand in my pantaloons pocket. He was an officer. He "went through me" with great celerity, took away my pocket-book and watch, scrutinized keenly a ring of keys he found in one pocket, and demanded sharply, "What's this?" concerning a small bottle of morphine, which I had received from Paris, and which he clearly thought was some burglarious utensil. They put my name and address down in a book, and then brought a grated opening in the door, there being lamps burning in the corridor.

I soon became accustomed to the light and surveyed my cell. The dirt there was astounding. There were many names written on the already opening the apartment, and the soles of their bare feet were crusted with the dirt from the stone-floor, but made a narrow bed, with a mean little mattress and a hideous flannel blanket, for us three to go on.

"Hi there! Ohe jam satis!

One of us was a sailor. He was in, he said, on a charge of robbing a mess-mate.

"And did you?" I asked.

"Do I look like or thief?" he asked, with proud scorn.

I certainly thought he did, but I didn't say so. I offered him a cigar instead.

The other of us was in for an attempted burglary.

"And did you?"

"Who? Me! No! It's a damn conspiracy."

He took a cigar also.

Fortune never quite forsakes us. That lucky package of Havanas became my spar in this wide ocean of distress. I kept myself awake with them through all the long night, during which I never once left my feet. The bed was too nasty to even sit on, of course, and the only other seat in the cell was still nastier. So I paced the stone-floor till my brain, I can't say I was especially disturbed in a morbid sense. I rather—upon my word—I rather liked the idea of it, viewed as an idea. But it was very tiresome, I must say.

They stuck three tin dishes full of some nauseating mess through the door somewhere about seven o'clock, I guessed (I hadn't my watch, you know), one mess for each of us. My companions ate their messes with greedy relish. Then they ate mine; and relieved me very much by doing so, as I was not entirely certain but that prison discipline would compel me to eat it, and I feared it was a little too rich for my stomach. I should certainly have thrown it up if I had ever got it down.

Of course, when I was taken before the magistrate, it was a simple matter to establish my identity.

There was great indignation in our set for a few days about it, and all sorts of vengeful threats were made, principally by young fellows like Parkes Porter, Jun., who would run from a caterpillar with its back up.

One was going to have Action discharge that policeman off the force.

"Let him alone," said I; "he did his duty. It was no fault of his."

Another was going to cowhide that young gentleman—Harris his name was. He was engaged to him now, you know; apologized in the handsomest manner about it.

"Pooh!" said I; "let him alone too. It was not his fault either."

Then whose fault was it, St. Clair?" demanded Perkins Porter, Jun.

"Mine," said I.

And this is to warn Smith, in a friendly manner, to keep away, unless he is prepared to settle with Mrs. Jones, and Miss Julia Jones in the bargain. I wouldn't mind lending him the money for the board-bill if he stands ready to do the entirely fair thing by Miss Julia, and will settle down.

ANCIENT EGYPTIAN FASHIONS.—The Egyptians shaved their heads as a mark of distinction. Wigs composed of rough-haired and long-bearded Asiatic nations. They also shaved their beards, which were allowed to grow when in mourning, and looked upon in any other circumstances as a sign of low and unfashionable life. The beard grew over their chosen poles wigs made of curled hair, with a series of plaits at the back. Children, who could not afford the expense of real hair, had theirs made of black sheep's wool. By a rather singular taste, they also wore false artificial beards, which they likewise ordered to be inspected at their pleasure. The latter were generally made very short and square; that of a king equally square, but much longer, and in all cases the end was curled and turned up at the end. Ladies wore their hair long, and rolled in front by means of pomatum, part of which they used to plaster back, and the remainder descended on each side of the face in two large curls. Their dress was generally had an ornamental fillet round the head, with a lotus bud in front by way of ornament. Some of the ornaments of the ureus included in a head-dress representing a peculiar kind of serpent, supposed to be the deity of the asps; and princesses were usually distinguished by a coiffure of ex-traordinary height, surmounted by the riches of the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms.

ATTACHMENT OF ANIMALS.—There were two Hanoverian horses which died a few days ago during the same day during the whole Peninsular war, in the German Brigade of artillery. Any One of these horses had been engaged, after which the survivor was picked to assist, and in this way it happened that it refused to eat, and was constantly turning his head round to look for his companion, and sometimes to neigh for him. Every one was taken, and all means that could be thought of were adopted to induce it to take nourishment, but these were surrounded him on all sides, but he paid no attention to them. He would not touch corn, and his strength scarcely, and he died from hunger, not having tasted a bit from the day his companion died.

A FLOWER STORY.—We are told that the Duke of Tuscany was the first gentleman who wore a bunch of jasmine, and he was so jealously fearful lest others should enjoy the sight of it that he issued a decree that strict injunctions were given to his gardener not to give a slip, not so much as a single branch, to any one. The command that the gardener would have been faithful had not love wounded the heart of a beautiful girl, the daughter of a fair but penniless lord, whose want of a dowery and his own poverty alone kept them apart. She contrived to get by bribing one of his minions he procured her with a nosegay, and, to reward the man, she presented it with a kiss. The poor girl, wishing to preserve the bloom of this nosegay, put it in water, and the water in a few minutes grew all the year. In the following spring it grew and blossomed, and in the following autumn produced and ripened seed under the fair nymphs cultivation that she was able to amass a little fortune by selling the produce of which love had made her, when, with a sprig of jasmine in her bosom, she was married to the object of her love, the gardener of her heart. And the Tuscan girls to this time wear the jasmine flower in their hair, wearing a nosegay of jasmine on their wedding-day; and they have a proverb, which is, "Happy is the bride the jasmine sees," rich enough to make the fortune of a poor husband.

STRANGE COINCIDENCES.—On the 16th of April Ovrid, Emperor of Russia, died, both occasions remarked that crimes; and William III., Anne, George I., George II., George III., Queen Victoria, Napoleon, and Louis Napoleon have all died on a Saturday.

PRECAUTION.—The best way to be "Wealth of Nations," shows, in a few simple words, the value of the diamond. Every guarantee it will afford for the very worst of which the diamond receives its best name and recommendation. In other words, a diamond, nothing is so useful as water, it will purchase scarcely any thing. It will purchase very little money and a small amount of any other commodity can be had in exchange for it. On the other hand, a diamond, although only value in itself, a great quantity of coin or other goods may be had in exchange for it. Hence, a diamond of the same size as water value in exchange could not be more richly explained to the very simplest capacity.

But the diamond belongs as much to the poet as to the philosopher or the political economist. Poets have chosen to draw his contrast, too—not between the diamond and water, but between the gem and a flower:

Though the same sun, with all-diffusive rays,
Blush in the rose, and in the diamond blaze,

We prize the stronger effort of his pow'r,
And fly unbounded to the transient flow'r.

This judgment, however unquestioned it may have been in the schools of the "great Anne" and "great Brunswicks" probably, in the present day, would be the strongest effort of the sun in giving brilliancy to the diamond than there is in giving fragrance to the rose. The "blush" of the one and the "blaze" of the other are equal as the result of effort, for each is of God's work and of God's will. Whatever may be the difference of their value in exchange, we know that a single rose is the best of a fair young girl adds more to the adornment of her person than a string of diamonds. It is the touch of an innocent, happy girl a more delicious thing to see than the glare of the most profusely diamonded woman? And then, chemists now are said to be able to reduce the diamond to its primitive charcoal; but none know as yet how to have it though dead, their side is a delicious memory of the by-gone. "Time of roses," it has been said, "it is not those that adorn them—pure to the sight and sweet in memory. Bright, but unsubstantial, hard, diamonds never yet perfumed their wearers. There is a charm in them, St. Andrews says, which is not known to those who have their own. Women who wear diamonds, said the saint, may be as pure and charitable as she genus, but this quality assuredly, will grow as hard.

EARLY AUTUMN.

Across the brook the yellow golden rods,
With nodding plumes, and tidy swaying there;
Above the stream the summer's flying seeds,
Like tinsken lances, fill the balmy air.

A golden light upon the mountain slopes,
His feet are hid in valley vapors wet,
The highland blackberry on the wooded steeps
Wears its ripe berries of enameled jet.

The pearly clouds, bestained within the sky,
Edged with pale gold, like summer castles stand,
Seen in a vision by some dreamer's eye,
Crowning the misty slopes of fairy-land.

The gentle winds scarce stir the fading leaves.
Scarce move the brown and withered clover heads;
And undisturbed the hairy spider weaves,
From bough to bough, her web of filmy threads.

Warm on the grass the brooding sunbeam lies;
The wandering airs are filled with faint perfumes;
The grave's-ire shoots each ridge decries
The upland sumach's crimson painted plumes.

Upon the topmost spray the blackbird sings,
With ruffled throat, his silvery-threaded song;
The drowsy bee, with gossamer wings,
Hums his low, rusty hymn the whole day long.

Idly I lie with half-shut, dreamful eyes,
And listen to the sounds that fill the air—
The bee's low hum; the wind's melodious sighs;
The various bleatings—floating blithely there.

Oh, soon will come the melancholy days,
When Nature seems to wear a hidden grief,
And black and bare the boss pleasant ways,
Where moaning winds shall whirl the faded leaf!

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE ART OF SELLING OUT.

IF was no wonder that Saxon could not be found when he was wanted, or that it was late before he returned to the house. His imprisonment lasted altogether more than an hour; and when Michael Vaughan at last rose and went away, he took a long walk round to another direction, in order that he might be able to account for his absence.

He had no sooner made his appearance, however, in the drawing-room than the Earl carried him off to Signor Colonna's study, and there left him. The Italian met him with outstretched hands; and Olimpia, who was writing busily, looked up and smiled at the same time.

"What am I to say to you, Mr. Trefalden?" exclaimed Colonna. "How shall I thank you?"

"Pray don't mention it," said Saxon, shyly.

"How can I help mentioning it? An act of such munificence—"

"I should be so much obliged to you," interrupted Saxon, "if you would say nothing about it."

"You may compel me to silence, Mr. Trefalden; but every true heart in Italy will thank you."

"I hope not, because I don't deserve it. I did it to—to please Miss Colonna."

"Then you please me, at least permitted her to thank you as you deserve to be thanked, Mr. Trefalden," said the Italian, as he glanced smilingly from the one to the other. "And now will you pardon me if I ask you a question?"

"I shall be happy to answer a thousand."

"You have given us your check for a very large sum," said Colonna, taking the paper from his desk, and glancing at it as he spoke. "For so large a sum that I have almost doubted whether your banker will cash it on presentation. It is unusual, at all events, for even millionaires like yourself, Mr. Trefalden, to keep so many loose thousands at their banker's. May I ask if you have any idea as to the thought?"

Saxon stared hard at the check across the table, and wondered whether Olimpia had really doubled it or not; but the slope of the desk prevented him from seeing the figures distinctly.

"I have no idea of it," he replied, with a troubled look, "and—and I am really afraid—"

"That your balance will be found insufficient to cover it?" added Colonna, entering a brief memorandum on the margin of the check. "It is fortunate that I asked the question."

"I am sorry—" stammered Saxon.

"Why so? It is a matter of no importance. I am afraid—"

"I do not know, of course, how your money is placed," said Signor Colonna, "but I should suppose myself, in your place, no difficulty in transferring to Drummond's whatever amount may be necessary."

"It is in Government stock—that is, a great part of it," replied Saxon, mindful of the great Overland Route Railway and Steam Packet Company.

"Oh, then you will only have to sell out. Nothing easier."

Nothing easier, indeed! Poor Saxon!

"You may have to go up to town, however," added Colonna. "By-the-way, who is your stock-broker?"

But Saxon did not even know what a stock-broker was.

"My cousin manages my money for me," said he, "and I must go to him about it."

"Mr. Trefalden of Chancery Lane?"

"Yes."

Signor Colonna and his daughter exchanged glances.

"I do not see that you need trouble your cousin this time," said the Italian, after a moment's hesitation.

"Why not?"

"Because a lawyer has nothing to do with the transfer of stock. He can only employ a stock-broker for you; and why should you not employ a stock-broker for yourself? It is more simple."

"I don't think my cousin William would like it," said Saxon, hesitatingly.

"Pray pardon me, but is it well that you should defer so much to his opinion? Might it not lead him to think himself privileged to set foolish some sort of censorship over your action?"

Saxon was silent. He knew that his cousin had already established that censorship, and that he had submitted to it. But he did not feel inclined to acknowledge it.

"The present," said Signor Colonna, "is a case in point. Your cousin is no hearty friend to our cause. He never gave sixpence to Italy in his life, and he will be grudged this noble gift of yours from an adverse point of view. Why then place the matter before him. If he disapproved you would not withdraw your donation—"

"Of course not!" exclaimed Saxon, hastily.

"And you would offend him by your interference. Be advised by me, my dear Mr. Trefalden, and act for yourself."

"But I do not know how to act for myself," said Saxon.

"I will put you in the way of all that. I will introduce you to my friend Signor Nazzari, of Austin Friars. He is an Italian Jew—a stockbroker by profession—and you may do whatever confidence you may be disposed to place in him."

Saxon thanked him, but his mind was ill at ease, and his face betrayed it. He was sorely tempted by Signor Colonna's proposition. He shrunk from telling his cousin that he had done, and he knew that William Trefalden would be ten times more annoyed than he was by the treatrexx transaction; but, on the other hand, he abhorred secrecy and double-dealing.

"But won't it seemly to William?" he said, presently. "I won't do what's sly, you know. I'd put up with any thing sooner."

Signor Colonna, who had been writing his counterpart's address on a slip of paper, looked up at this and laid his pen aside.

"My dear Sir," he said, "I but advise you to do as other gentlemen do in your position. No lawyer does stock-broker's work."

"That may be, and yet—"

"I am not ashamed to send for your lawyer if you were ill. He could but call in a physician to cure you, as he would now call in a stock-broker to sell your stock."

"I wish I knew what I ought to do!" ejaculated Saxon.

The Italian glanced impatiently toward his daughter; but Olimpia went on writing, and would not look up. She knew well what that her father wanted her to throw in the weight of her influence, but she had resolved to say nothing. The thing was hers to do, and she had done it; but she would not stoop to the less. So Colonna went back, unaided, to the charge, and argued till Saxon was, if not convinced, at least persuaded.

And then it was arranged that Saxon and Vaughan should go up to town together on the following day—the millionaire to draw out his money, and the dragoon to dispose of it as Signor Colonna might direct.

CHAPTER XLV.

WHAT HAPPENED THE EVENING BEFORE.

THE morning after the ball was, quite unlike the glowing golden mornings by which it had been preceded for the last fortnight, as Saxon and Vaughan left the house together in the London by the fast train that left Sedgebrook station at 9.45.

They were alone in the compartment, sitting silently face to face, each busy with his own thoughts. The landscape was dull outside, the low mist shrouded the plain and the Surrey hills, the steam hung in the damp air for a quarter of a mile behind the train, and the plump elms that came in places almost to the edge of the line looked ghost-like and shadowy. It was such a day as Saxon had often described to me when they write of England and the English—a day when the air is heavy and the sky is gray, and the whole world is full of melancholy. (I am provided with the spleen) goes out and cuts his throat on Primrose Hill.

During the day was, however, these two travelers were no less dreary. Saxon's thoughts were troubled enough, and Vaughan's were all gloom and bitterness. As he sat there, knitting his brows, gnawing the ends of his long mustache, and staring down at the mat between his feet, he was going over scenes in that foreground the evening before in Lady Castletowers's drawing-room—going over them, one by one, to look for look, just as it happened—going over to the hundredth time, and biting it into his memory deeper and sharper with every repetition.

This was what it was, and how it happened:

Dinner was over, coffee had been handed round, and Major Vaughan had made his way to a quiet corner under a lamp, where Olimpia sat reading. He remembered that she took how the light fell on her face from above, and how she looked up with a pleasant smile as he sat down beside her.

They fell into conversation. He asked first if he might be forgiven for dancing when she refused him, and then if she had any commands for Italy. To which she replied that her only commands concerned himself; that he should fight bravely, as, indeed, she had no need to tell so daring a soldier, and come back safe when the cause was won. Whereupon the thing that he had resolved never to say rose all at once to his lips, and he asked if there would be any hope for him when this had come to pass.

"Hope?" she repeated. "Hope of what, Major Vaughan?"

And then, in a few strong, earnest words, he told her how he loved her, and how, to win her, she would endure and dare all things; but she, looking at him with a sort of sad surprise, replied that it could never be.

He had never dreamed that it could be. He had told himself a thousand times that he was mad to love her; that he should be ten times mad to avow it; that his love; and yet, now that the words were spoken, he could not bring himself to believe that they had been spoken in vain.

So, with an eager trembling of the voice that he could not keep down, he strove hard to do so, he asked if time would make no difference; and she answered, very gently and sadly, but very firmly, that it would not.

None! He remembered the very tone in which she said it—the dropping of her voice at the close of the sentence—the sigh that followed it. He remembered, also, how he sat looking at her hands as they rested, lightly clasped together, on the volume of Dante that lay on her white and slender they showed against the purple binding—and how, when all was said, he longed to take them in his own, and kiss them once at parting.

Well, it was said, and done, and over now —all over!

And then he looked out into the gray mists and thought of Italy and the stirring life before him. He thought of it as much for the "cause," and he now cared for it less than ever. Olimpia's eyes had been the "cause" to him, and, like many another, he had attached himself to it for her sake alone. But that mattered little now. He needed excitement; and any cause for which he could be said to be done and danger to be encountered would have been welcome to him.

In the mean while, Saxon, sitting in the opposite corner, had his own troubles to think about. He was not at all satisfied with himself, in the first place, for the part he was playing toward his cousin. He could not divest himself of the idea that he was doing something "sly"; and that idea was intolerable to him. In the second place, he was not quite comfortable with regard to Miss Colonna. He had no reason exactly to question himself about the nature of his admiration for her, or even to speculate upon the probable result of that admiration; but he had become suddenly aware of the extent of her power, and was startled as finding to what lengths he might be carried by his desire to please her. William Trefalden had said that she was capable of asking him to take the command of a troop; and the unconsciousness of how Olimpia was capable of asking him to do a great deal more than that had dawned by this time upon Saxon's apprehension.

And then, besides all this, he could not help thinking of Lady Castletowers's sorrowful young face in the shadow of the monument, and the mysterious interest between Lady Castletowers and Miss Rivers. He had no sorrowful young face of her claim on Lady Castletowers. He would have given any thing to have been able to talk those things over with the Earl; but that, after what he had heard, was, of course, impossible. So he pondered and puzzled, and at last made up his mind that he would consult his cousin on the subject while he was up in town.

Thus, absorbed in their own thoughts, the two men sped on, face to face, without exchanging a syllable. They might probably have continued blind to each other's silence to the end, if somewhere about half-way between Sedgebrook Station and Waterloo Bridge, Saxon had not chanced to look up, and find his companion's eyes fixed gloomily upon him.

"Well," said he, with a surprised laugh, "why do you look at me in that portentous way? What have I done?"

Nothing particularly useful that I am aware of, replied Vaughan, with the dragoon. "The question is not what you have done, but what you may have done. I was wondering whether you mean to follow my example."

"In what respect?"

"In opening your eyes, of course. Are you intending to join Garibaldi's army?"

"No—that is, I have not thought about it," replied Saxon. "Castletowers going for?"

"I should think not. His mother would never consent to it."

"If he could, I would go," said Saxon, after a moment's pause. "There's camp-life to see, I suppose; and fighting to be done?"

"Fighting enough in the camp-life, I can tell you nothing about that. I fancy the work out there will be rough enough for some time to come."

"I shouldn't mind how rough it was," said Saxon, his imagination warming rapidly to this new idea.

"How would you like to march a whole day without food, then camp on the bare ground in a soaking rain, with only a knapsack under your head, and get up at dawn to fight a battle before breakfast?" asked Vaughan.

"I should like it no better than others, I dare say," laughed the young man; "but I shouldn't mind trying it, and Castletowers could go. We've been planning to make a tour together by-and-by; but an Italian campaign would be a hundred times better."

"If he were as free as yourself, Castletowers would be off with me to-morrow morning," said Vaughan; and then his brow darkened again as he remembered how not only Saxon, whom he suspected of admiring Olimpia Colonna, but the Earl, of whose admiration he had no doubt whatever, would both remain behind, free to woo or win her, if they could, when he was far away.

It was no pleasant humor that Vaughan was in; and when, at the end of the journey, Saxon proposed that they should dine together, he declined, on the plea that he had business to attend to.

"Which route do you take?" asked Saxon, all unconscious of what was passing in his companion's mind.

"The most direct, of course—Dover, Calais, and Marseilles. I shall be in Genoa by eight or nine o'clock on Sunday evening."

"And I at Castletowers!"

"How is that?" said Vaughan, sharply, "I thought you said your time was up yesterday?"

"So it was; but Castletowers has insisted that I shall prolong my visit by another week, and so I go back this evening. How we shall miss your set dance!"

But to this civility the Major responded only by a growl.

CHAPTER XLVI.

WILLIAM TREFALDEN EXPLAINS THE THEORY OF LEGAL FICTIONS.

SIGNOR NAZZARI was a tall, spare, spider-like Italian, who exercised the calling of a stock and share broker, and rented a tiny office under a dark arch in the midst of that curious web of passages known as Austin Friars. He had been prepared for Saxon's visit by a note from Colonna, and met him in a manner of voluble servility, punctuating his conversation with bows, and all his prostrating himself in the dust of his office. Files were not plentiful in Signor Nazzari's web, and such a golden fly as Saxon was not merely very glad.

It was surprising what a short time the transaction took. Colonna might well say nothing was easier. At first of all they went to the Bank of England, where Saxon signed his name in a great book, after which they returned to Austin Friars and waited while Signor Nazzari went somewhere to fetch the money; and then he came back with a pocket-book full of bank-notes and crossed his neck by a steel chain—and the thing was done.

Thereupon Major Vaughan solemnly tore up Saxon's check in the stock-broker's presence, and received the value thereof in crisp new Bank of England paper.

"And now, Trefalden," said he, "fare you well till we meet in Italy."

"I've made up my mind yet, remember," replied Saxon, smiling.

"Make it up at once and go with me in the morning."

"No, no; that is out of the question."

"Well, at all events, don't put it off till the fun is all over. If you come, come while there's something to be done."

"Trust me for that," replied Saxon, with a somewhat heightened color. "I will not miss the feasting if I haven't shared the fighting. Good-by."

"Good-by."

And with this, having traversed together the mazes of Austin Friars and emerged upon the great space in front of the Exchange, they shook hands and parted.

Saxon turned his face westward and went down Cheapside on foot—he was going to Chancery Lane, but he was in no hurry to reach his destination. He walked slowly, paused every now and then to look in a shop-window, and took a turn round St. Paul's. He pretended to himself that he was in no hurry to get Nelson's monument; but he had seen Nelson's monument twice before, and he knew in his heart that he cared very little about it. At length inexorable fate brought him to his cousin's door; so he went up the dingy staircase, knocking very gently, and hoping not to find the lawyer at home. On the first landing he met Mr. Reckwitch with his hat on. He was just coming out, and that respectable man was going to his dinner.

"Mr. Trefalden is engaged, Sir, with a client," said the head clerk, to Saxon's immense relief.

"Oh, then you can say that I called, if you please," replied he, turning slowly and languidly, and not to find the lawyer at home. On the first landing he met Mr. Reckwitch with his hat on. He was just coming out, and that respectable man was going to his dinner.

"Mr. Trefalden is engaged, Sir, with a client," said the head clerk, to Saxon's immense relief.

"Oh, then you can say that I called, if you please," replied he, turning slowly and languidly.

"But I think the gentleman will be going directly, Sir, if you wouldn't mind taking a seat in the office," added Mr. Reckwitch.

"I—I—don't like to trouble you to come by-and-by," said Saxon, reluctantly.

"As you please, Sir, but I'm confident you wouldn't have to wait five minutes."

So Saxon resigned himself to circumstances, and waited.

The clerks were all gone to dinner, with the exception of Gorkin the red-headed, whom Saxon surprised in the act of balancing a tobacco-pipe upon his nose.

"Pray don't disturb yourself," laughed he, as Gorkin, overwhelmed with confusion, lifted the bit of his head and disappeared behind it as if he had been shot. "I should like to see you do that again."

The boy emerged cautiously, till his eyes just cleared the lid, but he made no reply.

"It must be very difficult," added Saxon goodnaturedly trying to put him at his ease.

"It ain't so difficult as standing on your head to drink a pint of porter," said the boy, mysteriously.

"Why, no—I should suppose not. Can you do that also?"

The boy nodded.

"I can put half a crown in my mouth and bring it out of my ears in small change," said he. "If I'd half a crown handy I'd show you the trick."

Saxon's fingers were instantly in his waistcoat pockets, and the half-crown would have changed owners on the spot, but for the sudden opening of William Trefalden's private door.

"Then you will write to me, if you please," said a deep voice; and the owner of the voice, who seemed to be holding the door on the other side, remained out of sight.

"You may expect to hear from me, Mr. Behrens, the day after to-morrow," replied the lawyer.

"And Lord Castletowers quite understands that the mortgage must be foreclosed on the tenth of next month?"

"I have informed him so."

"Must, Mr. Trefalden. Remember that. I can afford no grace. Twenty thousand of the money will have to go direct to the Worcestershire agent, as you know; and the odd five will be wanted for repairs, building, and so forth. It's imperative—quite imperative."

"I am fully aware of your necessity for the money, Mr. Behrens," was the reply, uttered in William Trefalden's quietest tone; "and I have duly impressed that fact upon his lordship. I have no doubt that you will be promptly paid."

"Well, I hope so, for his sake. Good-morning, Mr. Trefalden."

"Good-morning."

And with this Mr. Behrens came out into the office, followed by his lawyer, who almost startled at the sight of his cousin.

"You here, Saxon?" he said, having seen his client to the top of the stairs. "I thought you were at Castletowers."

It would have taken a keener observer than Saxon to discover that the wish was father to Mr. Trefalden's thought; but there could be no doubt of the reflection.

"Well, so I am, in one sense," replied the young man. "I'm only in town for the day."

"And what brings you to town only for the day? Nothing wrong, I hope?"

"Oh no—nothing at all. I—that is, you—" And Saxon commenced in the art of equivocation, floundered helplessly about in search of a reason that should be true, and yet not the truth.

"You want to consult me about something, I suppose," said the lawyer, observant of his perplexity. "Come into my room and tell me all about it."

So they went into the private room, and William Trefalden closed the double doors.

"First of all, Saxon," said he, laying his hand impressively on the young man's shoulder, "I must ask you a question. You saw that client of mine just now, and you heard him allude to certain matters of business as he went out?"

"I did," replied Saxon; "and I was sorry—"

"One moment, if you please. You heard him mention the name of Lord Castletowers?"

"Yes."

"Then I must request you on no account to mention that circumstance to the Earl. It is a matter in which he is not concerned, and of which there is no need to inform him."

"But it seemed to me that he owed twenty-five thousand—"

William Trefalden smiled and shook his head.

"No, no," said he; "nothing of the kind. It is a simple transfer of capital—a private transaction in which the Earl's name has been incidentally used; but only his name. He has nothing to do with it, personally—nothing whatever."

"But—"

"But you heard only the end of a conversation, my dear fellow, and you misunderstood the little you did hear. You understand that this is not to be repeated?"

"Yes—I understand," replied Saxon, doubtfully.

"And I have your promise to observe my request?"

Saxon hesitated.

"I don't like you, cousin William," he said, bluntly; "though, of course, you know that without my telling you. But I don't know how to doubt my own eyes, either. I heard that big, cross-looking old fellow distinctly say that Castletowers must pay him twenty-five thousand pounds by the tenth of next month. What can that mean, if not—"

"Listen to me for three minutes, Saxon," interrupted Mr. Trefalden, good-humoredly. "You have heard of such things as legal fictions?"

"Yes; but I don't understand what they are."

"Well—legal fictions are legally defined as 'things that have no real essence in their own body, but are acknowledged and accepted in law for some especial purpose.'"

"I don't understand that either."

"I should be surprised if you did," replied his cousin, with a pleasant smile; "but I will try to explain it to you. In law, as in many things, my dear fellow, we are occasionally glad to adopt some sort of harmless hypothesis in order to arrive at conclusions which would otherwise cost more time and trouble than they are worth. Thus, when a legal contract is made ex sea, the deed is dated from London, or Birmingham, or any inland place, in order to draw what is called the cognizance of the suit from the Courts of Admiralty to the Courts of Westminster. Again, a plaintiff who brings an action into the Court of Exchequer fictitiously alleges himself to be the Queen's debtor. He is not the Queen's debtor. He owes the Queen no more than you owe her, but he must make use of that expedient to bring himself under the jurisdiction of that particular court."

"What intolerable nonsense!" exclaimed Saxon.

"One more instance. The law requires that eight years or so, the law of ejectment is founded on a issue of legal fiction, in which a an imaginary man called John Doe lodges a complaint against another imaginary man called Richard Roe, neither of whom ever existed in any mortal form whatever. What do you say to that?"

"I say, cousin, that if I were a lawyer, I should be ashamed of a system made up of lies like that!" replied Saxon.

Mr. Trefalden flung himself into his armchair, and laughed.

"I won't have you abuse our legal fictions in that way," he said. "These little things are the romance of law, and keep our imaginations from drying up."

"They ought not to be necessary," said Saxon, who could not see the amusing side of John Doe and Richard Roe.

"I grant you that. They have their origin, no doubt, in some defect of the law. But then we are not blessed with a Code Napoleon; and perhaps we should not like it if we were. Such as our laws are, we must take them, and be thankful. They might be a great deal worse, I can tell you."

"Then is it a legal fiction that Castletowers owes Mr. Behrens twenty-five thousand pounds?" asked Saxon.

William Trefalden winced. He had hoped that the wool-stapler's name would have escaped Saxon's observation; but it had always nothing of the kind. Saxon remembered every word clearly enough; names, dates, amount of money, and all.

"Precisely," replied the lawyer. "Lord Castletowers no more owes Mr. Behrens twenty-five thousand pounds than you do. He would be a ruined man at this moment, Saxon, if he did."

"His does not behave like a ruined man," said Saxon.

"Of course not. He would not be filling his house with guests and giving balls if he were. So now all's explained, and I have your promise."

Saxon looked earnestly in his cousin's face. He fancied that no man could look another in the face and tell a lie. Many persons entertain that belief; but a practical acquaintance with it does not exist. Your practiced liar makes a point of staring into his hearer's eyes, and trusts to that very point for half the success of his lie. But Saxon would not have believed this had an artful tale been told him. Therefore he looked in his cousin's face for evidence—and therefore, when William Trefalden gave him back his look with fearless candor, his doubts were at once dispelled, and he promised unhesitatingly.

"That's well," said the lawyer. "And now, Saxon, sit down and tell me what you have come to say."

"It's a long story," replied Saxon.

"I am used to long stories, my dear cousin."

"But I am not used to telling them; and I hardly know where to begin. It's about a lady."

"About a lady!" repeated William Trefalden; and Saxon could not but observe that his cousin's voice was by no means indicative of satisfaction.

"In fact," added the young man, hastily, "it's about two or three ladies."

Mr. Trefalden held up his hands.

"Two or three ladies!" said he. "How shocking! Is Miss Grosvenor one of them?"

"Oh, dear no!" replied Saxon, emphatically —perhaps a little too emphatically. And then he plunged into the story. It began at his first meeting with Miss Rivière at the Waterloo Bridge station, and ending with the adventure in the Haymarket.

Mr. Trefalden heard him to the end very patiently, putting in a question now and then, and piecing the facts together in his mind as they were brought before him. At length Saxon came to a pause, and said:

"That's all, cousin; and now I want you to tell me what I can do."

"What do you want to do?" asked the lawyer.

"I want to help them, of course."

"Well, you have the young lady's address. Send her a check for fifty pounds."

"She wouldn't take it if I did. No, no, cousin William, that's not the way. It must be done much more cleverly. I want them to live moneyed people, and to let you know—enough to keep her poor mother in Italy, and pay the doctor's bills, and all that."

"But this artful lady Castletowers—"

"Lady Castletowers is as hard and cold as marble," interrupted Saxon, indignantly. "I had rather starve than take a penny from her. If you had heard how grudgingly she promised that miserable twenty pounds!"

"I am not supposed that her ladyship had a hand open as day, for melting charity," said Mr. Trefalden.

"Charity!" echoed Saxon.

"Besides, I doubt that it is charity. There must be some mistake—some. I have heard the name of Rivière in connection with the Wynnclifs or the Pierrepoints—and yet— Pshaw! if Heckwitch were here he could tell me in a moment."

And Mr. Trefalden leaned back thoughtfully in his chair.

"I wish you could suggest a way by which I might do something for them," said Saxon. "I want them to get it, you know, without knowing where it comes from."

"That makes it difficult," said Mr. Trefalden. "And yet it must not seem like alms-giving."

"More difficult still."

"Unless—unless if were possible to give her some sort of commission," said Saxon, doubtfully; "as a commission for colored photographs of the Italian coast, you know. Would that do?"

"It is not a bad idea," replied the lawyer. He might do, if skillfully carried out; but I think I hear Heckwitch in the office."

And Mr. Trefalden went to the mouth of his head clerk, leaving Saxon to amuse himself as well as he could with the dingy map and the still more dingy law books.

At the end of a long half hour he came back with a paper of memoranda in his hand.

"Well?" said Saxon, who was tired to death of his solitary imprisonment.

"Well, I believe I know all that is to be learned up to a certain point; and I have, at all events, found out who your railway heroine is. It's a somewhat romantic story, but you must sit down and listen patiently while I relate it."

WAITING.

WAITING many a lonesome hour,
Waiting ever, aye for thee,
Till the sunbeams on the tower
Slant and fade from off the lea,
Till all light from maiden's bower
Slips into a hazy sea.

Waiting while the snow-drop springeth,
Piercing through the ice-bound sod,
Waiting while the summer bringeth
Flowers, fair offerings to her God:
While the sun of autumn flingeth
Golden gleams, and corn-fields nod.

Waiting while cold winter stealeth
O'er the sunshine-loving earth,
Waiting while its Yule bell pealeth
Sounds of blessed joy and mirth;
Waiting until Time revealeth
To my soul the bliss he birth.

Waiting while my spring is waning,
Melting into summer days;
Waiting, only patience gaining,
No reward, no meed of praise;
Waiting, till—the remaining
There will be but faintest rays.

Waiting? What reck I of waiting
Days and months and years maybe?
If Time only is creating
In thy bosom love for me,
Then am I far overrating
Life-long years of misery.

Youth and love shall not be hoarded,
I can wait, and war with strife,
If to me may be accorded
One brief hour through all my life,
When—(and oh! how well rewarded)
I may hear thee call me—" wife."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A NOT at a prophetic examination was asked "What is the meaning of regeneration?" "Oh, to be born again," was the reply. "Very correct," said the man of the book. "Would you not like to be born again?" Tommy gave no reply, but looked pressed for an answer, at last said "No." "Why, Tommy?" Tommy replied, "For fear I might be born a girl next time."

I say, Sambo, where you get de shirt studs?" "In de shop, to be sure." "Yah, you just told me you hadn't no money." "Miss Dinah come." "How you get dem, den?" "Well, I now on a cash in do window 'Collar Studs,' so I jest wash and collect dem."

THE LOST FLEMAN.—The following extraordinary advertisement appears in a Sheffield paper:

"The above seems a very much like telling me to wash myself," said the patient. "Well," said Abernethy, "you may be open to such a construction."

THE CROOK.—"My dear friends," said a missionary, at one of the late anniversary meetings, "I have seen many a crook in the course of my travels—crooks of Hindostan, where I have been sojourning for many years, have a proverb that, 'Though you bathe a dog's tail in oil, and bind it in spices, and you can not get the crook out of it.' Now, a man's education bites it simply the crook in the dog's tail, which can not be eradicated; and I hold that every one should be allowed to keep his own peculiarity to himself."

LINES TO MY UMBRELLA.

Ah! what is that companion dumb
That autumn, winter, spring, or summer
I should always have? My umbrella!

But ah! too oft when showers come,
What left, as Yankees say, "at home"
Was I have left behind? My umbrella!

What does too oft a loss become
To friends whose bounty is scant?
(Friendship meets no return) My umbrella!

Henceforth, then, foul or fair, by gum!
Whether or no they hold the drum,
I'll never part from thee, my poor,
Bereft! Bereft!

Henceforth, too, I'll my latest crumb,
My latest drop, my fortune's sum,
Give to my friend—but not my umbrella!

THE STANDARD OF JUDGMENT.—Judge a man by his actions; a soldier by his scars; a lawyer by his client's gloves; by his strut; an irishman by his swagger; an Englishman by his mustache; a footchman by his shoulder; a justice by his frown; a great man by his modesty; a tailor by his ability; and a woman by her sartorius.

A forty-day broadcast, on whom the memory of the honey-moon already seems to have become powerless, wants to know why his wife is like a small pie. Do you give it up?—Because, says the mufeeling wretch, she is now a little tart.

"I shall be at home next Sunday night," a young lady remarked, as she followed her beau to the door who seemed to be somewhat wavering in his attachment. "So shall I," was the reply.

It doesn't follow that, because we have taken a position step, we ought to retreat it. The man's a wise old one man who crossed a bridge, and, on being told that it was labeled "dangerous," turned, and recrossed it in a hurry.

"Mr. Jones must get there in her mouth!" "Eh! why do you ask?" "Because the paper says—one caught—bit of fun," and said he was going to take honey from her lips; and she said, "Well, make haste."

A COMMON ORNAMENT.—"Ah, Charley," said one little fellow to another, "we are going to have a cupola on our house." "Pooh, that's nothin'," rejoined the other; "papa's going to get a mortgage on ours."

What is the difference between a couple of Mermaids and Summer and Autumn? The former are two Sea-daughters and the latter two Sea-sons.

"Start your heart," said a considerate father to his son, "for you are going now among some fascinating girls." "I would much rather steal theirs," says the unpromising young man.

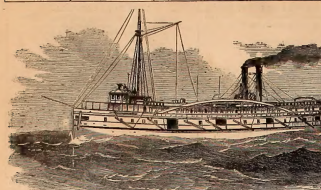
Adam, in his capacity of gardener, was undoubtedly the lawnator of the well-known phrase "the dig-nity of labor."

A BLOCKHEAD.—"What a fine head your boy has!" said an admiring friend. "Yes," said the fond father, "he's a chip of the old block—with eyes, you see." The father, teacher said yesterday that I was a young blockhead."

It is a question for the consideration of the medical faculty, whether patients suffering from a deficiency of iron in the blood ought to be benefited by the use of steel punches on an habitual horseback.

A person's character depends a good deal upon his birthplace. For instance, a man who has been brought up by the police seldom turns out respectable.

"Are you the mate?" said a man to the Irish cook of a vessel lying in port. "No," said he, "but I'm the man that boils the mate (meat)."



A DIFFICULT TEST.—A woman in St. Louis killed her husband because he parted her hair. It is sometimes difficult for a husband to tell whose hair he is pulling when he clutches that on his wife's head.

Somebody has found out a new way of taking pictures, by which they can be taken better in the night than in the daytime. A photographer has missed several times the frames that hang by his door, and doesn't approve of the new plan.

A flag dies as an old man walks—by the aid of a staff.

What a pity it is that Abdel-Kader left England before the 13th of August! The gallant Emir, who is doubtless a good shot, would have found himself much at home among the Moors.

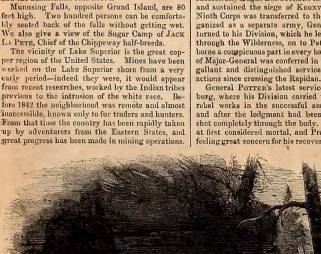
VIEWS ABOUT LAKE SUPERIOR.

We give on this page several views of the Lake Superior region, which has lately become an object of great interest, both on account of the novel features presented to tourists, and on account of the extent and value of its mineral resources. Among our illustrations are two views of the Pillared Caves, and a sketch of Munusing Falls, opposite Grand Island.



The Pillared Caves are near Grand Island and in the woods about forty rods from the lake shore. The base of the caves are 20 feet above the present level of the lake. There is a heavy forest separating them from the shore. The theory of their formation is, that by subterranean action of a volcanic nature a harder species of rock was forced up through a softer species. Since this event, by the action of water (for it is supposed that formerly the lake was 20 feet higher than at present) the soft rock has been worn away, leaving the hard pillars and the admonitine roof above.

OLD THUNDER, A CHIPPEWAY INDIAN.

Munusing Falls, opposite Grand Island, are 80 feet high. Two hundred persons can be comfortably seated back of the falls without getting wet. We also give a view of the Sugar Camp of JACK LA PETE, Chief of the Chippeway half-breeds.

The vicinity of Lake Superior is the great copper region of the United States. Mines have been worked on the Lake Superior shore from a very early period—indeed they were, it would appear from recent researches, worked by the Indian tribes previous to the intrusion of the white race. Before 1842 the neighborhood was remote and almost inaccessible, known only to fur traders and hunters. From that time the country has been rapidly taken up by silventurers from the Eastern States, and great progress has been made in mining operations. The productive region is limited to the range of the trap hills, which commence at Keweenaw Point and recede southwestwardly in a belt about two miles wide. The strata of the trap rocks dip toward the north and disappear beneath the lake. On Isle Royale, 45 miles north, a similar group emerges from the lake, so that the latter appears to be a basin in these ancient strata.

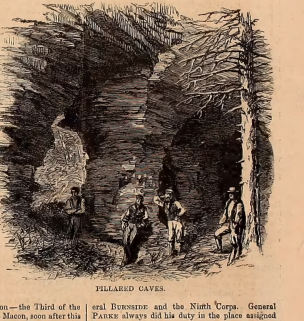
PILLARED CAVES.

MAJOR-GENERAL POTTER.

MAJOR-GENERAL ROBERT B. POTTER entered the service in 1861 as Major of the Fifty-first New York Volunteers—"Sheppard Rifles." His first engagement was at Roanoke Island, where he led, in the assault, the first detachment of troops that entered the enemy's works; he was wounded at Newbern, where, after having been shot through the hip, he directed operations for four hours, leaning on his sword. When recovered, he took command of his regiment, and led it through the campaign in Virginia, under POPE, serving with great distinction at Cedar Mountain, Manassas Plains, Chantilly, etc. Then, conducting it into Maryland, he took a very efficient part in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam. In the latter it was the Fifty-first New York, led by Colonel POTTER, and the Fifty-first Pennsylvania, led by Colonel (now Major-General) HARTRANFT, which, at last, carried the famous "Stone Bridge," over Antietam Creek, in the face of one of the most terrific fires of the war. Here General POTTER was again wounded, but continued to lead his regiment throughout the campaign; and, at Fredericksburg, he had already established so high a character for cool daring that, when it was represented to the General commanding the army (Major-General BURNSIDE) that some service which he wished rendered could not be performed, he replied, "I know a man who will do it. Send for POTTER and the Fifty-first New York."

Shortly after this Colonel POTTER was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General, and ordered to the West; and while there he presided over the court-martial before which VALLANDIGHAM was tried. Subsequently, having been placed in command of the Second Division of the Ninth Corps, then commanded by the amiable and able General PARKE, he served, with his usual success, at the siege of Vicksburg and at the taking of Jackson. Thence he passed to the command of the Corps, and with it successfully fought LONGSTREET through Tennessee, and sustained the siege of Knoxville. When the Ninth Corps was transferred to the East, and reorganized as a separate army, General POTTER returned to his Division, which he led, under GRANT, through the Wilderness, on to Petersburg—having borne a conspicuous part in every battle. His brevet of Major-General was conferred in June, 1864, "for gallant and distinguished services in the several actions since crossing the Rapidan."

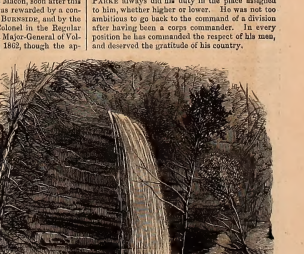
General POTTER'S latest service was at Petersburg, where his Division carried the centre of the rebel works in the successful assault last April; and after the lodgment had been effected he was shot completely through the body. The wound was at first considered mortal, and President LINCOLN, feeling great concern for his recovery, went specially to visit him. It is a pleasure to announce that he is now quite recovered, and occupies a prominent position in the Military Department of the East.



At the outbreak of the rebellion General POTTER was a successful lawyer in New York. He is a son of the late Bishop POTTER, of Pennsylvania, and a grandson of the venerable Doctor NOTT, the distinguished President of Union College.

GEN. PARKE.

MAJOR - GENERAL JOHN G. PARKE, military commander of this city, was born in Pennsylvania in 1827. He graduated at West Point in 1849, with the brevet rank of Second Lieutenant in the Corps of Topographical Engineers. He was second in his class, General GILLMORE being the first. His duties previous to the Rebellion were mainly in the West and Southwest. In New Mexico he was for some time on the staff of Colonel MONROE, who commanded in that Territory. Previously he had held in succession the Secretaryship of the Light-house and River and Harbor Improvements Board. In 1857 he was chief astronomer and surveyor of the Northwest Boundary Commission. In August, 1861, he returned to Washington, and was promoted to a Captaincy in his corps of Engineers. About the same time he was appointed to a Captaincy of the Thirteenth Regiment of Regulars; and on November 23, 1861, to a Brigadier-Generalship of Volunteers.



JACK LA PETE'S SUGAR CAMP.

PILLARED CAVES.

General PARKE'S first popularity was gained in connection with the Burnside Expedition, of which he commanded the Third Brigade. He distinguished himself in the battle of Roanoke Island, and the next month at Newbern. For his gallantry at Roanoke Island he was made Brevet-Major. On the 24 of April, 1862, he was promoted to the command of a division—the Third of the Ninth Army Corps. At Fort Macon, soon after this appointment, his gallantry was rewarded by a complimentary order of General BURNSIDE, and by the rank of Brevet-Lieutenant Colonel in the Regular Army. His commission as a Major-General of Volunteers dates from July 18, 1862, though the appointment, made originally in December of that year, was not confirmed until March 9, 1863.

At the battle of Antietam General PARKE was chief of staff to General BURNSIDE, which position he still retained when BURNSIDE succeeded General M'CLELLAN in the command of the Army of the Potomac. In March, 1863, he was promoted to the command of the 9th Army Corps, with which his military history has been so intimately connected. Two months later we find him at Cincinnati, presiding over the Court of Inquiry in the case of Captain DICKERSON, Assistant Quarter-master. He resumed command of his corps in June. At the capture of Vicksburg, July 8, 1863, he commanded the left of the army, having under him the Ninth and part of the Sixteenth Corps. After the capture he assisted in the pursuit of JOE JOHNSTON. Again we find him chief of staff to BURNSIDE in that General's East Tennessee Campaign. In March of the present year he was again placed at the head of the Ninth Corps, BURNSIDE having been relieved. It will be seen from the above record that from the beginning of the late war General PARKE has devoted himself entirely to the interests of his country, and that he has held on pretty closely to General BURNSIDE and the Ninth Corps. General PARKE always did his duty in the place assigned to him, whether higher or lower. He was not too ambitious to go back to the command of a division after having been a corps commander. In every position he has commanded the respect of his men, and deserved the gratitude of his country.

DISEASED CATTLE IN ENGLAND.

THE cattle pestilence now raging in London, and which is spreading in all directions through England, is likely to cause an extent of loss which it is scarcely possible to estimate. Although little more than a month has passed since this disease was recognized in the metropolitan district the loss of cows is stated to be nearly three thousand; and this number is probably under the truth, for in many cases the most strenuous exertions have been made by some cowkeepers to conceal the presence of the pestilence on their premises, and dispose of the infected animals in various markets, in this way adding to the mischief by spreading the disorder, and also endangering human health by the sale of meat which is quite unfit for food. Every precaution, however, is now being taken to prevent the spread of the plague by separating and destroying the animals affected by the use of disinfectants, and by a more careful sanitary regulation of stables. Great care also is taken that diseased meat shall not be sold in the markets; still it is estimated that thousands of the extremely poor of London are today living upon the flesh of cattle, because it is diseased, and can therefore be bought cheaply. This fact is of dangerous import when we consider the probable appearance of the Asiatic Cholera in England. Indeed some cases of this cholera have already been reported in London.

The cattle disease was brought into London by importation. In the month of June nearly 120,000 head of cattle were brought into Great Britain from over the sea. The overcrowding of cattle in the London sheds, and the imperfect ventilation of the stables, gives the plague abundant material on which to feed.

The engraving on this page shows a group of condemned cattle in one of the lairs near the Metropolitan Market, in Islington. These animals are mostly cows, and were believed to have been intended for sale in the market; but the taint of disease having been discovered in them by the market inspector, they were seized, condemned, and sent to the slaughter-house to be destroyed. The poor creatures presented a most pitiable appearance. There was a discharge of matter from the nostrils, and a copious flow of saliva and bloody mucus from the mouth. On laying the hand upon their skins the sensation was felt as though a collection of air was contained between the hide and the flesh; and each continually emitted a moaning sound, as if suffering from great pain. Their heads were drooping to their feet, as if in the act of feeding, but food they were utterly unable to swallow.

Would it not be well for our farmers to carefully inspect their dairies, and see that their stables are in a wholesome condition? And especially would it not be wise for our city authorities to take measures to prevent an outbreak of the disease in the crowded cattle-pens of this city?

THE BROTHER THIEVES.

The earliest pieces of theft we can at present call to mind are the removal of her father's household-gods by Rachel, and the plundering of the treasure-chest of Panamantin, the rich and learned King of Egypt, this last exploit being left on record by Herodotus, most delightful of historians.

This wise and rich monarch got a strong room built for the preservation of his numerous riches, but he scarcely showed his wisdom in allowing its outward wall to be accessible to all comers, for it formed a portion of the boundary of the outer fir trees. The cunning architect contrived that one large stone extending the entire breadth of the wall might be easily removed, without leaving any perceptible interstice, and on his death-bed he bequeathed the secret to his two sons. These scarcely soon after paying the last respects to their father's mummy, repaired by night to the outer wall, removed the stone (we are unable to explain the modus), and getting into the chamber, conveyed away some of its most precious contents. This was only the first visit, and the King, on his periodical inspections, found his glittering treasures diminishing without the slightest clew as to the nefarious means employed. The inner surface of the wall showed not the slightest flaw, and to the strokes of the hammer every portion answered with a uniform solidity. The stone placed on the door at his last going out was found untampered with on every occasion of visit, and the puzzle and perplexity advanced to an alarming point. However, something should be done, and the wise king did the wisest thing under the circumstance. He had a trap in the neighborhood of the choicest article a trap from which no escape was possible, and on the next visit of the brothers one who ventured inside was effectually secured, body and limbs.

The other entering with all due precautions, they examined the machine and found no possible mode of escape. The captured man then proposed to his brother to behead him, and thus save the life and the reputation of the other members of the family. On the free man expressing his repugnance to the deed he answered, up this fetch whether you like it or not. If you refuse, you needlessly sacrifice our mother's life and your own. This view of the case decided the brother to the shocking deed. The head was carried away and the stone replaced.

The baffled king on finding the headless corse had still to endure the annoyance of knowing one remainder at least to be still at large. His next proceeding was to have the body suspended from a gibbet, and closely watched, the watchers being privately instructed to take into custody all who seemed affected by sorrow at the sight.

The news coming to the ears of mother and brother a council was held to save their dear relative from annihilation. Well, revenge the guards resolved on a clear driving along an ass laden with wine-skins; and just as he passed, and they were looking with much concupiscence on the casualty, the cord that tied the neck of one of them came loose and out began to run the odorous red stream. On rushed the men in a courageous fashion to prevent the precious liquid from merely soaking the ungrateful dust. Some made its way down their throats, and the neck of another skin being loosed by chance, a further distribution took place, the owner lamenting his mishap aloud. However, as there was no cure for spilled liquor but to drink it, he soon joined his helpers, and getting exalted (in appearance), he said he'd cut and sparing another one's skin and drowning sorrow. The festival came to an end later in the night, every guard lying supine and indifferent to the result. The clown, in other words, the brother of the victim, then shaved half the hair off every man's head, and freeing the poor remains from the gibbet, had then conveyed home, embalmed, and united to the head.

The King was highly enraged, but he soon turned his thoughts to the approbation of the very talented criminal. By proclamation he made known that his daughter was about selecting a husband, and that persons of any rank were at liberty to pay their addresses, the whole being thus arranged. The matter was admitted to a certain standard room in the palace; and the princess sat at a convenient communication with this room, and asked him certain questions, and if the answers were not satisfactory he was allowed to depart uninformed and unnoticed. The individual whose answers pleased the lady would be her future spouse.

After several had undergone the trial the expected man presented himself. Being laid under strict obligations to speak the truth, he was told in the street had stolen one of the royal lady to reveal the most painful and the most joyful incident of his past life. Dreading the dire consequences of an untruth he acknowledged that the beheading of his brother was the most sorrowful, and the recovery of his body the most joyful of all the events of his life.

"You are the man," said she, firmly grasping his covered wrist, which its owner did not attempt to withdraw, "Lights here!" Domestics entered into the darkened rooms with flambeaux, but there was no man within the outer apartment, and the lady found herself in possession of the arm of a man lately dead. The wooer, fearing bad faith, had come prepared.

Panamantin being now at his wit's end publicly invited his tormentor to present himself, giving such a pledge as even the King of Egypt could not fail to ratify, that he would leave him alive pardon him and make him his son-in-law. He was soon gratified by the appearance of the outlaw, and neither he nor his daughter was ever after heard to complain of the new accession to the royal line of Egyptian kings.

ABOUT CHESS.

Louis the Thirteenth, who detested games of chance, and would not allow them to be played at court, was so passionately fond of chess that he has played even when riding in his carriage. Each man had a pin at his foot, which, being stuck into a padded chess-board, resisted the joltings of the royal vehicle.

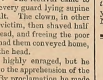
With some individuals the love of chess has been strong enough to counterbalance the fear of dying. John Frederick, Elector of Saxony, made prisoner in 1547 by Charles the Fifth, was playing chess with his fellow-captive, Ernest of Brunswick, when he received the news of his condemnation to death. After a few remarks on the irregularity of the emperor's proceedings he quietly continued his game. On winning it he expressed his satisfaction, and then retired to devote himself to the religious exercises befitting his situation.

A Turkish spa, who had incurred the Sultan's displeasure, received the sentence of death while playing chess. The game was far advanced, the position interesting, and he entreated the officers to allow him to finish it. They consented, and he won. Then, after thanking them for their politeness, he himself the fatal document, and quietly submitted to his fate.

When a messenger informed Alamin Ben Haroun that the city of Bagdad was besieged, "Hold your tongue," said the caliph; "don't you see that I am on the point of giving a checkmate?" The same inviolable composure in the presence of his enemy brought them to court, and pensioned them. His father, Abdallah the Third, used to bewail his sad fate in having no enjoyment but playing chess—more than for moving checkmate!

It is hard to believe that any one can ever have chessed away or made a set when proposed as an enigma. Nevertheless Boerna (otherwise called Buttlepeckle) for short, physician and sage to Noushiwan the First, and tutor to his son Hermoz, divined the secret.

A King Hind had sent to Borzu's royal master a chess-board, chessmen, and a letter.



"O king," it said, "may you live as long as the celestial spheres endure to move orbits! I entreat you to examine this chess-board, and to set it before the eyes of the greatest scholars and sages in your kingdom. Let them carefully observe everything, and discover, if they can, the principles of this marvelous game. If you succeed in penetrating the mystery, I promise to acknowledge myself your majesty's tributary; if not, as it will be clear that you have no genius in learning, you will be in duty ought to pay me tribute; for man's veritable grandeur consists in his knowledge, and not in treasures and money, which are only fleeting and perishable things."

All the court counselors and ministers set to work, but their answers proved unsolvable. In seven days' reflection required by the king had nearly elapsed when Borzu rose, and undertook to discover, all alone by himself, the clew to it in a day and a night. He shut himself up, tried each piece on the board, comparing the various movements of each, until the whole and complete truth flashed upon him. The court then assembled, King Hind's envoy and Borzu's rival, Borzu gave a formal lecture on chess, explaining to his wondering audience the arrangement of the pieces and the game's maximum, in recompense, loaded him with favors and dignities.

CONSTITUTION

LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigation of the liberal-minded and scientific to cases which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past few years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any reformers.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick." while others doubt their permanency, think that disease can only be cured by the "slow, respective process of Nature."

In order that the health like the balance be well-balanced scale, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of PARALYSIS, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

DIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATTLENCY, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BLOOD, and for all

SCROFULA.

STRUMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATIONS, SALT RHEUM.

THIS TRULY OBJECTIONABLE AND ACQUIRED, filling life with untold misery, by all usual medicinal remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

(ARTHRITIS), LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, TIC DOLOUREAUX.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. Almost instantaneous pains are almost entirely alleviated—enormous swellings are reduced. Cases, chronic or recent, where every variety of thirty preparations have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the bad breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other difformities of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Mott Fistulæ upon the female face, engendering upon a diseased state of the Liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will restore the secretion, and remove the deposit, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Eye, giving rise to Lacquer, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an ulcerated or cancerous condition of the throat organs, accompanied with hoarse or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

Knowledge Often Saves Life.

Every living being has in his system

Impurities,

When these are within their natural limits our health is good; but, when they are in excess, pains, colds, rheumatism, gout, debility, costiveness, diarrhœa, dysentery, erysipelas, &c., &c., afflict us. What we have to do to recover our health is to take out from the BOWELS and the CIRCULATION the excess of impurities. This done, health follows of necessity.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS

Are the only medicine that can do this with entire safety to all the organs of the body.

Hundreds of Thousands

Are now living who have adopted BRANDRETH'S PILLS as their only remedy for periods of from thirty to fifty years, and whose average health is excellent. They have always cured themselves, when sick, by using these Innocent and Infallible Pills.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. Sent upon it, BRANDRETH is white letters.

MILITARY EXECUTION AT CAMP CHASE.

On the 6th of September Camp Chase was, for the first time in its history, the scene of a military execution. On that day, in accordance with the findings and sentence of the Military Commission so long in session at Cambridge, approved by Major-General Orb, Commander of this Department, HIRAM OLIVER and JOHN WESLEY HARTUP were hung for the murder of J. B. COOK, Provost Marshal of the Seventeenth District. The two men were removed to Camp Chase from Cambridge August 30, their sentence not having been made public, and they apparently laboring under the impression that the punishment was to be light.

The impression was, however, rudely dispelled by the information suddenly imparted to the prisoners on the 5th that the next day they must undergo the death penalty. The effect of the announcement upon the prisoners can not be easily imagined, much less described. OLIVER was disposed at first to treat the matter coolly, merely remarking that it was rough, but on meeting with his wife, who had been in camp since Friday, he gave way to most violent demonstrations of grief. HARTUP was much affected, and was much depressed from the moment he heard his sentence.

HIRAM OLIVER was born in Washington, Jefferson County, Ohio, and resided there until about three years ago, when he enlisted in the Forty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers. In July last he claims to have been discharged, moved with his family to Illinois, and engaged in farming. He has a wife and two children—either a pretty little girl of four years of age, and a little boy aged about seven months. He was about twenty-four years of age, was of medium size, and had rather good though rather weak features.

MR. JOHN WESLEY HARTUP, the brother of MRS. OLIVER, is about the same age as his brother-in-law, was born in the same county, belonged to the same regiment, and for some years lived with the OLIVERS. He and OLIVER bought farms adjoining each other in Illinois; left that State about the same time, for some purpose not made plain, and came together to Ohio. They were arrested in March last, and in June MRS. OLIVER left her Illinois home and came to her father's near Bloomfield, Ohio.

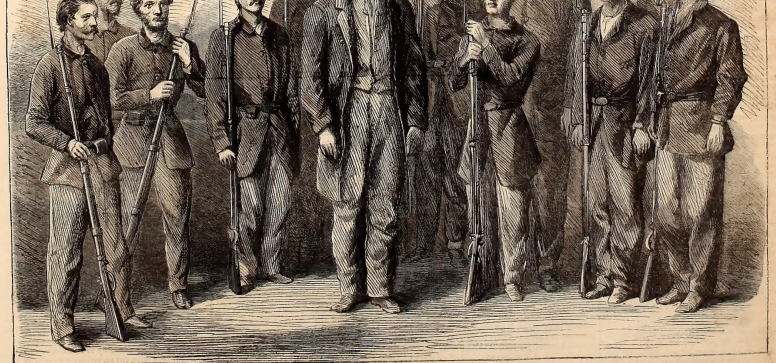
JOHN W. HARTUP.—[PHOT. BY E. S. WALKER.]

The scene of the parting of OLIVER from his family was affecting in the extreme. OLIVER confessed to the murder. He had killed COOK because he thought the latter would come to Illinois and arrest him. He insisted that HARTUP was innocent, though the latter admitted that he was an accessory. Both seemed penitent at the last hour. They were conducted to the scaffold, and at twenty minutes past one o'clock ascended the platform, when, after a brief address on the part of each, the execution took place.



CHAMP FERGUSON.

AMONG the guerrillas who infested Kentucky during the war CHAMP FERGUSON and his men were the most notorious. Their outrages were chiefly confined to Wayne and Clinton Counties. CHAMP FERGUSON himself is quite a character, though the bloodiest of rascals and murderers. His religious notions are, to say the least, rather queer. Whether he takes a hint from THEODORE PARKER, who used to call God "our Father and Mother," is uncertain, but CHAMP is in the habit of speaking of the Father of All as "the Old Man." He, in a recent interview with the editor of a Western paper, expressed his opinion that "the Old Man" had been on his side thus far in life, and he believed he would stay with him and bring him out of his present trouble all right. He thought the Campbellites were about as good as any of the religious denominations, and a little better.

CHAMP FERGUSON is now being tried at Nashville by a court-martial on the charge of committing murders and other acts in violation of the laws of war. The verdict has not yet been given, but there is no doubt that he will be punished with death for his many atrocities. Before the war he was arrested for the murder of REED, the constable, and confined in jail. At the outbreak of the rebellion he was released on his pledge to join the rebels. He claims that he had been previously a Union man. He then commenced his career of murder and robbery which made his name a terror in Kentucky. He acted under the orders of JOHN MORGAN until the latter made his raid into Ohio. He was with MORGAN in most of his raids in Kentucky and Tennessee. He surrendered at the close of the war, supposing that he would be let off with the oath of allegiance. CHAMP owns a considerable amount of land in Clinton County, Kentucky, estimated by the hundreds of acres. He has good reason for the wish, which he now expresses, "that there had never been any war."

THE HORRORS OF TRAVEL.

THE graphic but by no means extravagant illustration which we publish on page 600 scarcely needs any word of comment or explanation. During the present year Death appears to have set his mark upon the traveler, whether he journeys by railway or by the steamboat. Every day the record of mortality is continued from the day before, being only diversified in the manner of its occurrence. Now it is a collision, on the railroad or upon the lake; now it is a fire at sea; now the explosion of a locomotive, and then again the sudden precipitation of an entire train down a steep embankment and perhaps into some river. There has come to be a general feeling of insecurity and distrust, and every man or woman who steps out of a railway car or steamboat at the termination of their journey unhurt does so with a feeling of sensible relief. It is a fact that more lives have been lost by accident this year than in some of the severest battles of the war. It would have taken a heavy battle to have sent into the darkness of death the fifteen hundred soldiers so easily dispatched thitherward by the explosion of the Sultana. In most every case the disaster has been needless: it has arisen from carelessness in conductors, employés, and directors, who should in every such case be responsible for the murders committed.

THE ALBANY CONVENTION.

WHEN Isaac Canute found that the sea would not retire at his bidding he arose and withdrew. Mohammed discovered that the mountain would not come to him he went to the mountain. The Democracy of the State of New York have just followed in the footsteps of its illustrious predecessors. For years it has been sitting upon the shore bidding the billows roll and honor and obey the American people retire. And now that its ridiculous command is lost in the roar of the rising ocean of liberty and justice, it confesses that the billows will. Having encouraged traitors and stimulated civil war, it exhausted every method of perplexing the Government and disheartening the people, and on the eve of the final and universal national triumph it exultingly declared the war a failure and national ruin inevitable. The American people, insulted and indignant, with one hand overwhelmed the enemy in the field, and with the other utterly annihilated at the polls the whole line of the Democracy.

After a year of consternation its stunned and straggling columns begin to stir. But as if to show its total rout, not one point it proposes to reorganize upon its old basis.

In Ohio it asserts the very doctrines which the country has denied in the victorious field. It moans in Pennsylvania that the Union councils had been locked it would be still alive. But in New York—mutatis mutandis—with the perfection of comedy it resolves that "the past history to be found in the proudest records of the country," especially in the chapter entitled "The Chicago Platform," and that it is ready to meet the great questions of the future with the patriotism, fidelity to principle, and practical wisdom that have characterized its long and auspicious identification with the history of the nation."

There let us take breath and ask, as well as inextinguishable laughter will allow, why, in a crisis of mortal peril, the American people, to secure their national salvation, utterly obliterated all this Democratic patriotism, fidelity, and practical wisdom? And history gives the immediate memory of the people answer, because it was the patriotism of Benedict Arnold, the fidelity of Judas, and the practical wisdom of Horatio Seymour.

"The Democracy" of New York having thus completely referred to the proud memory of their contemptuous rejection by the people, enthusiastically resolve to support cordially a President whom they are still hoarse with denouncing as a usurper and traitor, whose election they deplored as a national disgrace, comparing him to the horse whom the Roman emperor made consul; and, finally, the Democratic guard of slavery gravely announce that the abandonment of slavery makes peace and Union possible.

The builders of last year's Chicago platform having thus bolted it whole; the revilers of the President having declared their sincere attachment to him; the lackeys of slavery having thus grinned over its corpse; and the bitter opponents of the war having duly cheered its happy and beneficent consequences; "the Democracy" of New York proceed, by the mouth of John A. Green, one of the most notorious Copperhead opponents of the war in the State, to nominate General Slocum, a Republican, a distinguished and honored soldier, and the military governor of Mississippi, who has just suppressed the "civil" Governor's authority. His unanimous selection is followed by that of Lucius Robinson, another Republican, and one of the most honest and faithful officers the State ever had; and his nomination in turn is succeeded by that of Martin Grover, another Republican, who left the Democratic party ten years ago, when its "proud record" was characteristically illustrated by "the patriotism, fidelity, and practical wisdom" of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise.

Thus poor old King Canute yields to the ocean which he can not command. Thus those who have systematically betrayed the principle of the Government surrender for the time to those who, under whatever name, have honorably maintained it. Thus the party which has thwarted progressive civilization in America eats its own words, abjures its own acts, turns one complete somersault, and its late face disappears.

The success of the Albany ticket, therefore, has in itself no particular political significance. The State could not have a better Controller than Mr. Robinson, nor a more incorruptible Judge than Mr. Grover; and General Slocum has proved his efficiency in one field and would undoubtedly not be wanting in the next. But these are some considerations worthy attention.

The anti-American spirit which has so long dominated the Democratic party still survives in the country. Its associations are all with the name Democracy. The organization of the party remains; and although its leaders temporarily desert their reactionary and natural ground, they are still the same, and the irresistible tendency of human nature will compel them to occupy it at the earliest practicable moment. That profound faith in the moral righteousness and political wisdom of fair play for all men, which is the mainspring of progressive American civilization, will never, under any probable circumstances, be found in the Democratic party, but in its antagonists. In every country there is a constant tendency to intelligent progress and an opposition to it. This makes the eternal Tory and Liberal parties of all countries and ages. In America Democracy is the American Tory party. It is useless to say that it was not formerly so, or that it does not claim to be so. We must deal with facts. The true party of the people in this country might have been called the Democracy, but the opportunity was lost. The name was surrendered, and the organization is not in the hands of those who sincerely love liberty, and in no other hands can the party of progressive liberty be safe.

The ignorance and prejudice of the country, the rabble of cities, and the aristocrats in feeling, all gathered under the Democratic name as the Democracy. The intelligence, the industry, the steady, elevated purpose of the country, gravitate to the opposition. There are unprejudiced and compact men in all parties; but the character of parties themselves is radically different. Thus the great eras of true progress in this country have been the eras in which the Democratic policy was overthrown. To the Democracy we owe, in late years, the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, the efforts of slavery to perpetuate itself, Dred Scott decision, the vitality of State sovereignty, and the armed insurrection of slavery against a free Government. To the Democracy we owe whatever name, Free-soil, Republican, or Union, we owe the education of the public mind and conscience against slavery, the emancipation, and established the Union upon the eternal rock of justice. The Democracy delights to call itself conservative. But its conservatism is merely negative; and no intelligent American can believe that the country would stand as nobly eminent as it does at this moment if the Democracy had ever been in power.

Therefore it is useless to sacrifice substance to shadow, or to bewail a name. He is not a very wise man who supposes that resistance to the true principle of constitutional liberty is at end in this country, or who does not see that it will again rally under its old name. The temporary ability of the leader to rule or to retain power may vary, but its permanent policy must be the same. "There are few statements more common than the assertion, sometimes," says Burke, "as to fall into the identical snare which has proved fatal to their predecessors." The inevitable tendencies of human nature are stronger than men. And the party of the friend of liberty or his country who helps to put in power those who have betrayed both because they think they will abide there, in the course of the New York Democracy at Chicago in 1864 and at Albany in 1865 is absolutely different. But the party will still be the nucleus of the reaction. But it is turned, but its heart can not be changed. A ship now tacks before a head-wind to the right, now to the left, but it is still the same ship pursuing the same voyage.

The duty of the Syracuse Convention is therefore plain. Let every patriot and friend of political American doctrine of equal human rights; state the course which it believes to be necessary to secure the real results achieved by the loyal people, as the President said, in the North Carolina delegation, that the reconstruction policy pursued by the Government is but an experiment, and nominate Governor Reuben E. Fenton, of which the late Illinois speech, that "as long as there is any hope of its success we must yield a hearty support to the President." Then let it nominate General Slocum and Messrs. Robinson and Grover, whom we understand to occupy, with their political associates of the last few trying years, this exact position; and the Convention will secure the defeat at this important juncture of the reactionary party which is striving to regain power through the personal popularity of candidates whom, for that purpose, it selects from its opponents. Such a course will strip off all masks and compel a reorganization of parties upon real grounds, which it was the chief object of the Albany Convention to avoid.

THE CHOLERA.

The recently published Sanitary Report of the Citizens' Association in this city, and the accounts in the newspapers of the gradual westward movement of the cholera, are very instructive and suggestive reading. The study will be complete if the reader adds the Report of Dr. Swinburne, the Health Officer of the port, upon the condition of the city docks and ships. From these authorities it appears that the modern plague is slowly and surely stealing toward us: that the harbor of the chief port in the country, the mouth of which the cholera would naturally first touch, is full of "rank pestilence." The matter emptied into the ships "is composed of the privy deposits conveyed through the house-sewers, and of the washings of earthy matters and garbage from the streets-gutters.... In warm and low tide, this fills lies frothing, like yeast—betting free, in the process of decomposition, combined offensive and pernicious gases and insupportable odors to permeate the air, which every breeze, whatever may be its direction, spreads over the island." After this congenial welcome in the harbor, the terrible guest will find the city perfectly prepared to entertain him, and to supply him with all that he most desires.

We have no conception of the alarming and totally unnecessary death-rate in the city of New York. The explanation is found in the Sanitary Report which the Citizens' Association has published. The city was divided into convenient sanitary districts. Each was thoroughly explored. The state of the soil, the number and character of the houses, the condition of their inhabitants, their occupations, health, and habits, the variety, character, and cause of their diseases, were all carefully noted by competent inspectors, and their reports compose the book. It is a ghastly tale. John Bagshot is our faithful and honored friend: he defends American liberty: he believes in the American principle. If he comes to New York we hope he will not fail to ask to see the tenement-houses, in the one Alsatia and St. Giles, that he may know how surely a disregard of that principle produces in New York the exact results it produces in London.

Mr. Bagshot can have no service among the poor is his highest honor, and authorises him to speak with authority, writes from London to the New York Times that the condition of the worst parts of that city differs from that of the worst parts of New York in extent only, not in degree. The filthiness, the suffering, the starvation, the horrible disease, the brutishness and crime of corresponding quarters are greater only because the number of inhabitants is greater. The tenements are the hot-houses of pestilence. There are parts of the city of New York where small-pox is a constant disease. The tenements carry gentlemen from their comfortable homes to their comfortable offices under the windows of houses where malignant fevers always lurk. Pestilence glares at them as they pass. Let the conditions change slightly, and it will also seize them.

Mr. Halliday, another of the wise and true men, who watch over the health of the stateliest and most splendid palace depends upon the condition of the cellar, writes to the Evening Post from the Five Points House of Industry, that in the deadly August of the year, 1832, Corlears Hook, the Five Points, and Rotten Row in Laurens Street, were "places in which the disease was most fatal. In Laurens Street they died off like sheep. In one two-story tenement and attic house sixteen or seventeen died." He truly adds that "Rotten Rows are not all over New York," and declares his sincere belief that nearly one-half of the permanent resident population of the city are living in such a state that cholera would be likely to single them out as it was then in the special quarters he mentions. In 1832 the cholera produced a general panic. It was unprecedented. It was not superstitiously feared. The city had made no preparation for it. Many physicians and clergymen fled. Business generally stopped. The public authorities sometimes used for hospitals. Yet the population was then only about three hundred and fifty thousand: it is now eight hundred thousand. The poorer class was then largely American: it is now mainly foreign. At least one-half, if not two-thirds of the people that fled the city: now it is impossible for any corresponding proportion of the inhabitants to escape.

The cholera would smite New York more fearfully than that of 1832 now smote old Florence six hundred years ago; and what is New York doing to defend herself? Every year she raises the revenue of a kingdom, and can not keep her streets clean. Her municipal authorities are a band of thieves who plunder under the sanction of law. Filth, ignorance, disease, mortality, are political necessities for those to whose hands the luckless city lies. Clean the streets, ventilate the houses, wash and feed the squalid population upon which the greedy eyes of the cholera are already fixed from over the sea, and the men who now thrive by the ignorance and brutality of the tenement-houses would be spewed out. It is not to be expected that they will adopt any efficient measures for the public safety. You might as well appeal to the dirty marble blocks of the City Hall as to the men who sit there in authority. When the cholera comes, and stops business, and starves the poor, and depopulates the city, we shall have another awful proof of the inexorable relation of public morality and public safety.

If any thing is to be effectually done to prepare for the cholera it will be by severe enterprise, and the sooner it begins the better.

A "PERFECT MODEL."

General Lee has accepted the Presidency of Washington College in Lexington, Virginia. In his letter of acceptance he says very properly: "It is the duty of every citizen, in the present condition of the country, to do all in his power to aid in the restoration of peace and harmony, and in no way to oppose the policy of the State or General Government directed to that object," and "that it is particularly incumbent on those charged with the instruction of the young to set an example of submission to authority."

These are very proper, if not very striking or original, sentiments. But as John W. Brockenbrough, rector of Washington College, in publishing the fact of General Lee's acceptance, indulges in some extremely ridiculous flourishes. This gentleman speaks with ecstasy of General Lee, but not in his capacity of President, but in some beloved old, "whose condescension in accepting so comparatively humble a position "wins for him a new title to the admiration and love of his countrymen." Will Mr. John W. Brockenbrough kindly mention General Lee's "old" titles to the national affection?

The enthusiastic rector perorates in the following manner: "In dedicating his future life to the holy work of e'ucating the youth of his country General Lee presents a new and interesting phase of his grand and heroic character—a character then which no more perfect model could be given living man. "'Tis a solid fabric, and will well support the laurels that adorn it.' Let the young men of the country, North as well as South, be wise and profit not less by his example than by his great example."

Truth, rhetoric, and patriotism are equally cheap, it seems, at Washington College. It is not our fault that the career of Robert E. Lee is thus offensively dragged before the young men of America; but it would be our fault and shame if we did not say to them that the man whom they are thus challenged to emulate and imitate was a soldier educated by his country, who, confessing that neither he nor any man had any personal quarrel with the North, so stab her to the heart. He was a generalissimo who knew that honorable prisoners within his lines —young men of the country who had done nothing but defend the life of that country which he assailed—were wantonly tortured to death by thousands, and who did not utter a solitary word of pity or protest. This is the "grand and heroic character" which American youth are invoked to venerate. They will obey the summons when they have learned to admire Benedict Arnold.

Loyal men are willing not to express their opinion of the late rebel chiefs. But common morality prohibits silence when those chiefs are exultingly cited as "perfect models."

STATE AND NATION.

A great many well-meaning gentlemen in the unorganized States are writing letters and making speeches to prove that those who took part in the rebellion honestly believed that the single States of this Union are sovereign, and that therefore they did not deliberately and wickedly violate their obligations to the Union. It was, they contend, the universal Southern theory of our Government.

So far as the present generation is concerned we believe that these gentlemen are correct, and that is the very difficulty. It is undoubtedly true that Washington and Marshall, and many other of the noblest Americans of the last century, who lived in the Southern States, were as truly persuaded of the enormity and peril of the doctrine of State sovereignty as the stanchest loyal men of to-day throughout the country. But Calhoun, and not Washington, has been the orthodox political prophet in those States. An intelligent and noted rebel officer, who was never north of Mason and Dixon's line until he was brought as a prisoner, told us that he had no more doubt of the right of a State to secede than he had of his right to eat dinner, and that the proclamation of President Lincoln calling for seventy-five thousand men to compel obedience to the authority of the United States seemed to him as insolent and monstrous as a summons from Louis Napoleon to enforce the authority of France in this country. And this, he said, was the universal conviction of his neighborhood in the Southwest.

That there were some who held to the paramount National sovereignty is doubtless true. But that they were not an imposing number is plain from the total absence of any vigorous protest against the rebellion. It is no answer to say that terror silenced them; that Union men were watched, and not suffered to assemble nor to vote. If the Union men had been a powerful body they would have assembled and voted and resisted. Could the Copperheads have dragooned the Northern States? Certainly not; for the whole moral force and vast majority of the population were loyal. The rebels did dragoon and silence the Southern States, because the vast weight of opinion as well as actual numbers of the white population were with them.

That population, as every well-informed man knows, had been long and systematically alienated from the Union. They were taught to being Virginians, Carolinians, Georgians, not of being Americans. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS was not a Union man. He was so long as he thought his section could control the Union to its own sectional purposes. It was a Union subordinate to State sovereignty which he supported. It was a Union whose Government had no right to enforce its authority against any citizen of the United States, if the State in which he lived released him from his allegiance. It was this universal conviction alone that enabled the rebellion to endure so long and so desperately.

Has the war changed this view? Do the people of the disaffected States hold any other theory of it to-day? Is it a real Union which we reorganize if they do not? If we sincerely wish a solid and true reorganization shall we not seek to found it upon all those of the Southern population who reject this theory? To the wisely discard an entire native class, in some States more than half the population, who have been always loyal to the national supremacy, and trust the welfare of the country entirely to those who, for any reason whatever, are willing to take an oath? Mr. HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON, of Georgia, for instance, has taken the oath of allegiance, and has been pardoned. Yet his loud assertions of his old, unchanged sentiments in Washington, where his oath, were no offence, that a loyal citizen silenced him with a threat of personal castigation if he did not stop. Mr. JOHNSON is therefore a fair illustration of men who take the oath without any change of heart. Is he the kind of Representative or Senator from Georgia that it is desirable to see in Congress? If he, and such as he, are intrusted by the loyal citizens of the United States, who are soon to decide the question, with the entire loyal government of the State of Georgia, to the absolute exclusion of the unswervingly loyal part of the State population whom Mr. JOHNSON and his friends could neither cajole nor frighten into rebellion, do we not show a subservience to the doctrine of State power which is as dangerous as it is absurd?

Every loyal citizen of the United States has rights in the State of Georgia which he is a very foolish man if he surrenders unconditionally to Mr. HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON and his friends.

BRITISH CAPITAL ON THE WING.

A PARTY of British capitalists and railway men, comprising SIR MORTON PETO, MR. KINNAIRD, Baronet, MR. KENNARD, and MR. LEE, and eighteen others nearly as well known in financial and industrial circles, arrived here a fortnight since, have been rapidly passing the time by inspecting our great broad gauge line, consisting of the Erie Railway, from New York to Salamanca, the Atlantic and Great Western Railway, from Salamanca to Cincinnati, and the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad from Cincinnati to St. Louis—a line of road which, though transacting but a fifth or less of the country's business, and impaired in its usefulness by the want of a consolidated management and a large and sound administration, is still, in view of the extent and fruitfulness of the country it traverses, the great cities it feeds, and the almost incalculable quantity of traffic it must one distant day prepare to accommodate, by far the greatest railroad in the world.

It is well understood that the first object of these English visitors is to inspect the Atlantic and Great Western Railway, which is exclusively owned by them and their constituents. That important line has been built since the year of 1857—which effectually stopped railway building elsewhere—with British and Spanish capital. The second Mother of Parliaments, the Spanish Duke of RIANZARES, and the Spanish banker SALAMANCA, have been interested in the enterprise from the beginning, and have supplied much money. But the greater part of the money required to build this road came from London, and was contributed, not unfrequently, at very darkest days of the war, when every mail from the United States bore tidings of failure and repudiation; at times of monetary stringency and panic; at times when rebellion seemed to threaten the very existence of the nation, and to forebode the ruin of the Government and of every corporate institution which lived under its laws. In those dark, dark days, when every prudent American capitalist held his money tight under lock and key, and would not invest a dollar in the United States, big enterprise, these Spaniards and these Englishmen, for month after month, and year after year, paid the weekly bills of the work of boring on the Atlantic and Great Western without a murmur, and, if they made a complaint, complained only that the bills were not heavier, the workmen not more numerous, and the great enterprise not nearer completion. Such a robust faith, such a dogged perseverance commend themselves to the applause of an enlightened mercantile community, and receive its reward which the twenty-two English visitors now among us have come to forecast.

But it would be a mistake to suppose that so large and influential a delegation from the fraternity of London capitalists and railway men have come here merely to look over the particular property on which so much British money has been expended. It has rightly been conjectured that their visit has a wider purpose. The way, which the New York business men are forced to buy back the stock they had sold in the same market in which they had sold it, at a loss which we dare say they can remember without recourse to their books. The stock rose thirty per cent. in sixty days.

Now if any of our country readers, meditating on these facts, should come to the conclusion that our sweet friends in England, who would not touch Five-Twenties at 35 @ 40, now intend to buy our railway securities at the present price, and should, on the strength of this conclusion, proceed to speculate for the rise in these securities on borrowed capital, let them take the blame as if they had their time and their money. For Wall Street is thick with quicksands, and each of them is gurt around with the whirlpool of panic and monetary perturbators. There are going by the unwary speculator a thousand pitfalls which wisdom and shrewdness cannot avoid. Increase of expenditures, over-issues of stock, sudden attacks of colic in the midriff of the money market, unexpected failures of great houses, amazing changes of policy at the Treasury department. All these portend ruin to him who speculates on borrowed capital. Your theory may be sound, and the progress of the course of events correct; but the end will not come when expected, and for you to whom its coming at this or that given time is essential, it will never come at all.

CRIMINALS IN SOCIETY.

IN his speech to the electors of Westminster just before the election Mr. JOHN STUART MILL, alluding to the corruption in the bribery practices English elections, said: "It is vain to hope that men will be shamed out of these things as long as they are not cut in society." It is precisely so with the officers of railroads in this country. As long as the most wanton and cruel murders may be committed upon roads by those whose agents they are finally responsible, and they are not criminally indicted, but are treated with the same courtesy and consideration as before, so long the slaughters will continue, and a sagacious man will make his will before he starts upon the shortest railroad journey.

If Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR or any other conspicuous citizen were the proprietor of a line of omnibuses in the city, and every day the horses ran away, or the wheels came off, or there were constant collisions, or the coaches were upset, and men, women, and children were continually injured, or even killed, there would be no indignation with the proprietor would be such that his house and his person would be hardly safe, and all who maintained friendly social intercourse with him would be perpetually odious to public censure. For the common sense of the community would sense at once that the proprietor had no end to the carriages if he chose, and if he did not choose that he was a proper subject for legal prosecution and criminal punishment, and that honest men do not cultivate the society of criminals.

Here is the case of Mr. OLIVER CHARLICK, President of the Long Island Railroad. The most wicked recklessness led to a deplorable catastrophe. The inquest was held, and, fortunately for us all, instead of a verdict of "no body to blame," or "visitation of God," the jury returned that they "do hereby censure OLIVER CHARLICK, the President of the railroad, for the careless, irregular manner in which the trains are run, and consider that he is indirectly responsible for the above-mentioned catastrophe." That is the mildest verdict that the plain facts of the case, and especially OLIVER CHARLICK'S testimony, allowed.

But now appears that OLIVER CHARLICK had a horse full of grass, and a staircase full by which five of them were killed, and upon the investigation CHARLICK were censured for his culpable negligence in permitting his horse to be in so perilous a state, would any honorable man hasten to offer OLIVER CHARLICK his hand? Would he not first say, "Wash off that blood?"

When that is the attitude of society toward such offenders, when people are made to understand that criminal carelessness is no more respectable in "gentlemen" than it is in the poorest laborer, and that OLIVER CHARLICK is a mere driver who was careless in the bloodshed of that fearful moment upon the Long Island Road than the poor switch-tender upon the Hudson River Road, by whose inattention to do all that was required of him at once the train was thrown into the river, we shall discover that the daily slaughter of our fellow-citizens is not in the least necessary. MR. MILL'S words have a wide application and in many directions: "It is vain to hope that men will be shamed out of these things so long as they are not cut in society."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE WIRZ TRIAL.

We published with our last week a full history of the first ten days of the trial of Captain WIRZ. The subsequent proceedings for the most part consisted of details so tedious to add one story of murder and cruelty to another in a monotonous series of horrors. One feature in the evidence given on September 9 and 10 seems especial attention. The documents presented during the time the authorities at Richmond were cognizant of the illtreatment of our soldiers at Andersonville, were much by General Howell Cobb to the rebel Adjutant-General Cooper, dated Macon, Nov. 9, 1864, complaining of the crowded condition of the prison, and suggests that a hospital be built outside of the prison. If possible it would be better to make another prison, as he doubted very much whether there would be sufficient water for the accommodation of so many prisoners. General Cobb thirty thousand WIRZ had already in his charge. The report made by himself, May 8, 1864, was also offered in testimony, and makes with that of Cobb in advising the enlargement of the stockade and the erection of outside hospitals.

A letter from Brigadier-General Winder to General Cooper, dated July 5, 1864, and addressed to Colonal Chilton, of Richmond, says:

"No shelter whatever, nor materials for constructing any, have been furnished by the proper authorities. The ground being entirely bare of trees none is within reach of the prisoners, except that it been permitted to the overcrowded state of the inclosure, to scrange the camp with the few trees that were left standing when the prison was built. Even the privilege which he was formerly permitted to himself as best he can by stretching his blanket, or whatever he may have, over a pole, and lying on the side in the sun exposed. Of other shelter there has been none. There is no medical supervision of the sick whatever. Many (as recently yesterday) are carried out daily, who have died from exhaustion and disease, without the medical officer in charge ever seeing them. The dead are hauled out daily by the wagonload, and buried without further, than the most hasty, obsequies, being first mutilated with an axe, in the removal of the clothing, which they may have. The trench has to be issued in a very large portion, who are entirely unprovided with proper utensils, and have to dig it with the stupidity of fatal they are compelled to dig with their hands or with pieces of board, or anything else they can get. A cup or clothing has ever been issued. After inquiry the fact has been found that the Commissary-General of prisons and other sub-ecarbuties could readily be obtained. The number of prisoners arrangements were only intended for the accommodation of ten thousand men, and are totally insufficient, for the present number of twenty-three thousand men, the number of prisoners requiring medical treatment is an increased ratio. It is impossible to state the number of deaths that occur daily, as the surgeons in charge of the medical officers have never seen or heard of till their names are reported at the morning roll call. The transportation of the sick has been represented to be entirely insufficient, and authority is needed to be vested in the surgeons in charge to send to the hospital at once those who may be employed by the Government, and kept distinct from the rebel prisoners. In addition to the quarterly issue of clothing transportation to afford every facility practicable for procuring any blankets or supplies accumulated for prisoners.

A supplementary report was made by the same officer, on the 14th of July, to the cause of the increase in the condition of things which calls for the interposition of the Government, the gross mismanagement of the prison, its size as a station, etc.

On July 31 a report submitted by Inspector-General Chandler to the Richmond authorities at the beginning of August, 1864. This report, while speaking favorably the horrid condition of the prisoners and the tortures inflicted upon them, charges the culpability for their present treatment principally on General John H. Winder, rebel Assistant Inspector-General of Prisons, and Commissary Gen eral to exculpate WIRZ. Winder advocated in cold blood the starving of the men and shows the policy of starving and torturing the prisoners to death as a means of relieving the burdens of its Government. He says: "Starve them," he said, that one-half of them should die. Colonel Wirz was present at the place as one of Winder's staff officers, and a disgrace to civilization. After the reading of the report was concluded the Colonel was asked if the evidence stand, when he stated that he had no retraction to make in regard to what had already been given, but reserved to testify to additional details of the sufferings of the prisoners. The Colonel thought that it would have been easy to impress the condition of the sufferers, and to bring to light facts more and better food, if there had been no disposition to do so.

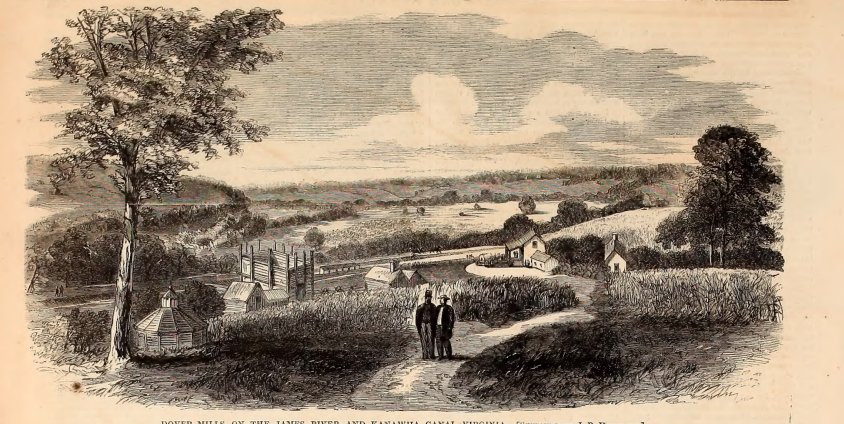
THE NEW YORK DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

The Democratic Convention met at Albany at Albany September 6. The resolutions adopted reiterate the usual platform of Democracy, declare that the war ought to be prosecuted to the people on the return of peace; demand the rights of the State against authority; honor the President's policy, and proclaim the national debt a national curse. Ex-Governor SEYMOUR was chosen President, and General Slocum, who has just been in conflict with the Governor, Vice-President. Van Buren was nominated for Attorney-General, Major-General M. B. Patrick for Comptroller, and Judge CHARLES P. DALY for Chief Justice of Court of Appeals, and Hon. Lucius Robinson for Governor.

NEWS ITEMS.

The Chicago Republican says that Dick Turner, the former keeper of Libby Prison, is reduced from a weight of 225 pounds to a mere skeleton, weighing about 90 pounds. About two months since he effected his escape from the Penitentiary in which he was confined, and for a short time broke diligent search was found in a house on Fifth street, in Richmond. He is now confined in prison in a cell 8 by 12 room by and seeing only the negroes who bring provisions. He is furnished with a Bible, a copy of Shakespeare, and a few magazines for reading.

The Commissioners of the Maryland Agricultural College appointed $2500 for the purchase of a site for a cemetery on the Agricultural College farm, for the burial of the soldiers and the men who fell in that ever-memorable battle. Ten acres of ground have been purchased near the ridge where Burnside's troops fought, and within sight of the house where the rebel General Lee had his headquarters during the battle. The ground has been inclosed with a neat fence.



General Lee has accepted the presidency of Washington College, in Lexington, Virginia. In his letter of acceptance he says that "it is the duty of every citizen, in the present condition of the country, to do all in his power to aid in the restoration of peace and harmony, and in no way to oppose any of the efforts which are now being made in earnest directed to that object;" and that "it is particularly the duty of those charged with the instruction of the young to set an example of submission to authority."

Governor Major-General Judson Kilpatrick will take the stump for the Union candidate for Governor of New Jersey.

In the Maine election, which took place September 11, the Democratic candidates suffered a great defeat. Gov. CHAMBERLAIN was elected.

Up to Saturday, August 26, less than 400 citizens of Richmond had taken the amnesty oath, and the Confederate flag of delegates would take place in four days.

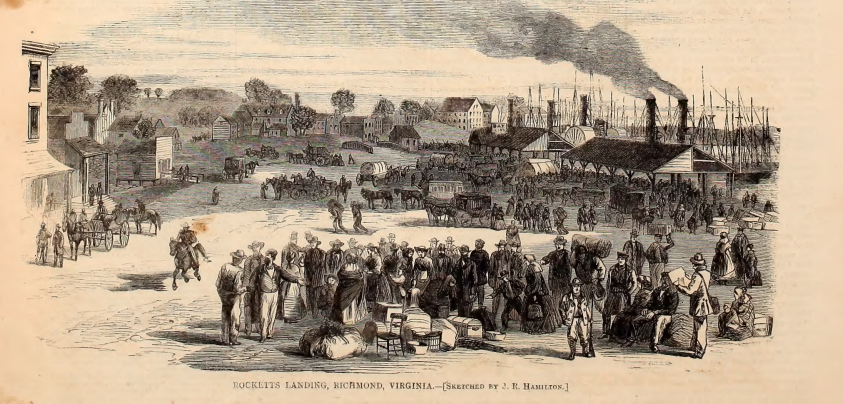
The Rev. Dr. HENRY WARD BEECHER, son of the late Dr. LYMAN BEECHER, is now in Paris, engaged in his studies for the legal profession.

DOVER MILLS, ON THE JAMES RIVER AND KANAWHA CANAL, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY J. R. HAMILTON.]

DOVER MILLS, ON THE JAMES.

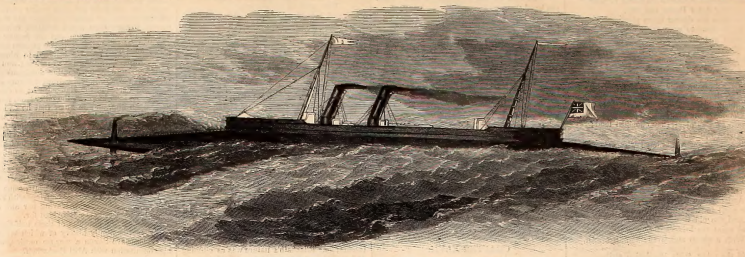
THE valley of the James River abounds in scenery of great beauty. On this page we present a view of Dover Mills, one of the loveliest spots in the vicinity of Richmond. This spot is, however, selected for illustration not so much for its intrinsic beauty as for the historic associations attached to it. The place is owned by MR. S. D. FISHER, usually known as DUNLOP FISHER, one of the leading miners and geologists of the State, and is situated some twenty miles from Richmond, on the James River and Kanawha Canal.

In the distance, to the left of the picture, is seen a graceful bend of the James River, while the canal occupies the fore-ground. At that bend of the river is the ferry where the gallant DAHLGREN attempted to ford in his nearly successful raid upon Richmond, which ultimately cost him his life. He had been told by his guide that the river was fordable at that point, but on trying it it was found not to be so. Failing there, DAHLGREN went further down to Manakin's Ferry, some four miles below, and found that impassable also. Naturally concluding that the guide had willfully misled him the fellow was immediately hung. Had DAHLGREN succeeded in fording the James at either of those points, and making straight for Richmond, it is the universal belief among all those best informed that he would have taken the city, and released our prisoners in Belle Isle, the Libby, and Castle Thunder; such was the consternation created at his daring movement, and so little the preparation that had been then made for resisting him.



Among the places destroyed during this memorable raid was Dover Mills, the subject of this sketch, and the ruins of which are seen in the fore-ground of the picture. It was one of the old Revolutionary mills, and at the outbreak of the war was in full operation as one of the largest and most valuable in the State. Its water-power is immense, and its contiguity to the canal greatly enhanced its value. The large work-shop which stood alongside, with turning lathes and other machinery for carpenters, wheel-wrights, etc., was entirely destroyed—a loss valued at least at $50,000 National currency. DAHLGREN'S men took from the present proprietor six fine horses, valued at $400 each: and in STONEMAN'S raid, during which he was visited also, he lost five splendid horses; so that Dover Mills has felt its share of warfare. But in spite of all these losses, and of his deeper sacrifice of a dearloved son on the bloody field of Gettysburg, there is not, perhaps, a more devoted lover of the Union than its present hospitable proprietor, nor one who had less to do with the fomenting of the dreadful war which forcibly drew his son and others into its hideous vortex. He tells many graphic anecdotes of the visits of our troops, who, he said, behaved very considerately under the circumstances.

The property seen on the beautiful range of hills in the back-ground belongs partly to the late Confederate Secretary of War SEDDON. Adjoining it is that of HOBSON, the son-in-law of Governor WISE, with whom the Governor usually sojourns. It is, altogether, one of the richest and most fertile spots to be found in the valley of the James.



ROCKETT'S LANDING, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

We present on this page a view of Rocketts Landing, the principal wharf at the port of Richmond. If any thing were needed as a proof of the vast difference between the state of affairs before and since the National occupation, it might be seen in the Rocketts of to-day and the miserable, deserted, Heaven-forsaken looking spot which was pointed out to the first comers from the North as the commercial entrepôt of the rebel capital. Then there was nothing to be seen on the landing but piles of disabled cannon and rusty fragments of war materials, nobody to be met but a few idle negroes, of all ages and sexes, coming to gape at the wonderful "Yankees." Now the scene is altogether changed. Rocketts has really resumed a portion of its former bustling character, and in a short time will far surpass it. We have opposition lines of splendid steamers running daily to and from Baltimore, Fortress Monroe, and Norfolk; at least a dozen steamers arrive and depart daily; the immense space, at the arrival of each vessel, is now crowded with omnibuses, hacks, drays, and every kind of vehicle for passengers and their luggage, where at first it was impossible, at any price, for the traveler to obtain a conveyance. Indeed we may say that the commerce of Richmond is now fairly started, and, in spite of the drawbacks still existing from political considerations, is destined to go on rapidly increasing at a rate that but few Virginians ever dreamed of.

The geographical position of this State, her climate, mineral wealth, and agricultural resources, her contiguity to all the great Atlantic markets, and the advantages she offers, as the natural outlet to the ocean of all the pent-up wealth of the great West, are all attracting already the serious attention of capitalists and emigrants. The recent important revelations respecting the gold, copper, and other mineral regions in Central Virginia are inviting capitalists, while emigrants are beginning to learn that they need not be going thousands of miles to the far West in search of what they can find quite as readily, and in equal abundance, within two or three days' easy travel from New York. In the fore-ground of the sketch our artist has represented an importation of some fifty or sixty Swedes who arrived a few days ago, and who go to join a larger number of their countrymen newly settled on their farms in the fertile valley of the James. "The more the merrier" of such kind of visitors just now. Virginia needs them, and can well repay their coming.

THE WALL STREET FORGERY.

We give on this page an illustration of a gold-check forged by Mr. EDWARD KETCHUM, who has been indicted for larceny and forgery. We also give fac-similes of his forged handwriting, as shown in extracts from letters found upon his person at the time of his arrest; letters which were intended to appear as addressed to himself by his near relatives, and as supporting his assumed character as a Western merchant. In the gold check the word Gold, it should be stated, is printed in gold letters running across the check.

JUDGE J. S. YERGER.

We publish on page 605 a portrait of the HON. J. S. YERGER, President of the Mississippi Convention, the first of the State Conventions held in the South.

Judge YERGER was born in Greenburg, Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, in 1810, from whence his father removed to Nashville, Tennessee, in 1816. The son there commenced the study and practice of law, and took an active part in the political affairs of the State. In 1837 he went to Vicksburg, Mississippi, and took a prominent position at the bar of that city when it boasted of such men as S. S. PRENTISS, JOSEPH HOLT, and other eminent legal gentlemen. For several years he was a member of the Legislature, and in 1850 was elected Judge of Courts of Law and Equity, which office he continues to hold by re-election to the present time. He was chosen as one of the delegates to the secession Convention of 1861, and strenuously opposed from first to last, and voted against the ordinance of secession.

My dear Son

Your letter of the 16th is just re^d. × × × in regard to spending money. I do not wish to place you under any restrictions upon that head. Having every confidence in your prudence and as far as it is necessary you & economy. Your friends here often enquire about you and it is very pleasant for me to say [illegible] many people you seem to have attached to you, your friendship when once is beyond all price and value and I cannot exhort too strongly upon you the disagreeableness of making the proper class of acquaintances and friendship and when those if you find them of the proper class do not give them up lightly ××

THE RAILROAD DIRECTORS.

Two railroad directors sat down to dine
At the Astor House one day.
And after the dinner came plenty of wine—
Jolly directors were they.
Surplus and dividend they had stored
Where it would keep and swell,
And the delicate business of the board
That day they had managed well.

But the buzzing wine rose to their brains
And drowned discretion out,
While the greenish tint of their heavy gains
Colored their thoughts, no doubt.
The door was ajar; they chuckled loud;
And a stranger, another man,
Whose head for a murdered wife was bowed,
Their chuckles could but hear.

Said one, "Do you understand my move
For a new track all complete;
Our case for the public weal 'twill prove,
And our stock will bull the street.
We shall turn the old rails outside in,
And the old ties upside down,
And paint the bridges, that shake like sin,
With a cheap and strengthening brown."

Said the other, "My Resolution strikes
Half the old hands away;
Each of 'em sent up if he likes—
There are cheaper hands than they.
Some see too much, and I will have done
With their knowing crowds of fear;
A worn-out road is best better be run
By a half-priced engineer."

The traveler rose with a hopeless groan
And went his desolate way;
He knew too well why he walked alone,
With his head in the mire of clay;
While the directors paid their bill
With never a sigh of care,
And to joking with Murray Hill
Rolled up through the golden air.

Next month was another "accident"
From a broken tie and rail,
And a score of precious souls were sent
Through the plunging gulch and pale;
And by many more, crushed, maimed, and torn,
Writhing in hopeless pain,
Was the life-long, fearful witness borne
Of the vile directors' gain.

OUR AUNTS.

WHAT would become of half of us if we had no aunts? I don't know precisely what would have become of a score of persons upon whom my mind's eye now rests; but I am certainly sure that but for their aunts they would have been in the race of life, by this time, nowhere. They would have had no out of the course long ago and gone to the deuce, or died in ditches, as their other relatives metaphorically predicted of them. It is mentally ordered in the great scheme of existence that nearly every person should have an aunt who is willing to grow into an old maid, and to sacrifice her life to the good of others—those others being generally her nephews and nieces. Aunts are the fairy good godmothers of society, the supplementary mothers who are often more kind and indulgent to the children than their parents are. There is not a single person any where who is not familiar with this idea of a good aunt. We sometimes hear of children who never knew their father or mother; but when is the child who never knew an aunt? When the father and mother disappear and leave the poor infant to the mercy of the world, who is it that takes the little waif in, and feeds and clothes it, and sends it to school? Who? The aunt. The good kind tender-hearted aunt, who, perhaps, has been passed over in life, who has toiled hard, who has suffered much, who, at any rate, has never tasted the joys of maternity—she certainly never knows the bitter vexations. It is really wonderful, under such circumstances, that aunts should retain as much as they humanity, that the fire of love should not have been quenched in their lonely hearts, that the milk of human kindness should not have dried up in their breasts long ago. We should be thankful to Heaven for these maiden aunts of ours: they are a legion of angels upon earth, forever hovering about us to pity and to succor.

I shall not be stating at all an exceptional case when I say that I had an aunt who was an "aunty dear" to three generations. This is one of the blessed things about our aunts. They are sent into the world to be good and also to live long. The good die early, sentimental folks say. Stuff! The good, blessed Lord, who is fain to have false men and wear false hair, and they are the most delightful creatures to kiss in the world. I can only think of that dear old aunty of mine (though I never call her until she was threescore; she was my grandaunt) as a fair young creature of seventeen summers, with blue eyes, and flaxen hair arranging over her shoulders to her waist. I have this vision of her—though, when I knew her, she was white-haired—I wore a brown wig that was any thing but invisible, and a cap that some folks would call a right—because she once told me that she was the last word. I see as a girl, she ran over the hill one morning early to bid good-by to her lover, who was going away to sea. She held me on her knee, and patted me on the head, and strained me to her breast, when she told me that story; and I knew that she had kept her great wealth of love for me and mine. For the sailor-boy fever came back. She had a lock of his hair which she used to take from a secret drawer and show me. It was jet black, and when she handled it it curled round her finger, as if the spirit of her sailor-boy had come back from the depths of the sea to embrace her with all that was left of him on earth.

"And what did you do, aunty," I said, "when you heard the news?"

"What did I do, laddie? I cried and cried until my heart was dry and my eyes were rain. I think I should ha' died if your mother hadna come: but when she came I took up wi' her. She had bonny black een just like Charlie's, and I loved her and nursed her for his sake. And when they had over mony o' them at hame I took her to live with me, and she was my lassie until your father married her. And then I was lonely again until your father had over mony o' them, when I took your sister, and now I've got you; and a pretty handful I've had with the lot o' ye."

She did not mean these last sharp words a bit; for the task, and that of succeeding generation to live with her, and it was always in danger of being smothered with kisses.

Ah, dear aunty in Heaven, what would have become of some of us but for you?

HALF A MILLION OF MONEY.

A PAGE OF FAMILY HISTORY.

EVERY student of English history is familiar with the noble and ancient name of Holme-Pierrepoint. A more stately race of men and women than the Holme-Pierrepoints never traversed the pages of medieval chronicle. Their famous ancestor, Thierry de Pierrepoint, "came over" in the train of Duke William the Bastard; but he was only the younger son of a younger son, and the houses which look back to him as their founder were, after all, but offshoots from that still more ancient line that held lands and fiefs in French Comté three centuries before the great conquest.

How Thierry de Pierrepoint came to be lord of many a fair manor in Northumberland, and his descendants multiplied and prospered, held high offices of state under more than thirty sovereigns, raised up for themselves a following in camp and council, and intermarried with the bravest and fairest of almost every noble family in the land, needs no recapitulation here. Enough that the Holme-Pierrepoints were an elder branch of the original Pierrepoint stock; and that Lady Castlecourt was the only child of a Holme-Pierrepoint, and whose mother was a Talbot, had really some excuse for her inordinate pride of birth which underlaid every thought and act of her life as the ground-color underlies all the tints in a picture.

The circumstances of her ladyship's parentage were these:

George Condé Holme-Pierrepoint, third Lord Holmes, of Holme Castle, Lancashire, being no longer young, and having, moreover, encumbered all a slender estate by extravagance, was married at fifty years of age, to the infinite annoyance of his cousin and heir-presumptive, Captain Holme-Pierrepoint, R.N., by the daughter of Lord Holmes's choice was just half his age. She was known as Portsmouth and its neighborhood as "the beautiful Miss Talbot;" she was the fifth of nine daughters in a family of fourteen children; and her father, the venerable Charles Talbot, held the rank of Rear-Admiral in the Royal Navy. It is, perhaps, almost unnecessary to add that Miss Talbot had no fortune.

This marriage was celebrated some time in the autumn of 1810; and on the 10th of October, 1811, after little more than one year of marriage, Lady Holmes died, leaving an infant daughter named Adelaide. Lord Holmes, a broken-hearted the widower shut himself up in Holme Castle, and left the child, of profound seclusion. He received no visitors, he absented himself from his parliamentary duties, and he was rarely seen beyond his own park-walls. Many fantastic stories began to be told of his temper and habits. It was said that he gave way to sudden and ungovernable fits of rage; and that he had equally strange fits of silence; that he abhorred the light of day, and sat habitually with closed shutters in a room without a door; he occasionally did not go to bed for eight-and-forty hours at a time; and a hundred other tales, equally bizarre and improbable, were told to make the world had almost forgotten him, and his little girl was between five and five years of age, Lord Holmes astounded his neighbors, his family, than astounded his heir, by marrying his daughter's governess.

How he came to take this step, whether he married the governess for her own sake, or for the child's sake, or to prevent his cousin's succession were facts known only to himself. That he did marry her, and that, having married her, he continued to live with her in the same unbroken seclusion life as before, was all that even his own servants could tell of the matter. The second Lady Holmes visited nowhere, and was visited by none. What she had been as Miss Holme-Pierrepoint's governess she continued to be as Miss Holme-Pierrepoint's step-mother. She claimed no authority. She called her husband "my lord," stood in awe of her stepchild, and yielded to the child's imperious temper just as she had done at the first. The result was that she remained a cipher in her own house, and was treated as a cipher. When, by-and-by, she also gave birth to a little daughter, there were no rejoicings; and when, some few years later, she died, and was laid beside her high-born predecessor, there were no lamentations. Had she brought an heir to the house, or had she filled her place in it more bravely, things, perchance, had gone differently. But the world is terribly apt to take people at their own valuation; and Lady Holmes, perplexed ——with the burden of an honor

Unto which she was not born," had rated herself according to the dictates of one of the lowliest and most timid hearts that ever beat in a woman's breast.

Thus it was that Lord Holmes became the father of two daughters, and was twice a widower over. And thus it was that Captain Holme-Pierrepoint, of Sowerby, escaped first Scylla and then Charybdis, and remained heir-presumptive to his cousin's coronet after all.

No two girls ever grew up more unlike each other than the honorable Miss Holme-Pierrepoints. There was a difference of nearly six years in their ages; but beyond this; but this was as nothing when compared with the difference in their appearance, dispositions, and tastes.

The elder was dark, stately, and remarkable from very early girlhood for that singular resemblance to Marie Antoinette, which became so striking in her at a later period of life. The younger, on the contrary, was pretty rather than beautiful, painfully sensitive and shy, and as unpretending as might have been the lowliest peasant girl upon her father's lands. Alethea never forgot that she was noble on both sides; but Elizabeth would have found it remember that she was noble on either. Alethea was cold and ambitious; but Elizabeth's nature was as clinging and tender as it was unselfish. Elizabeth looked up to Alethea as to the noblest and most perfect of God's creatures; but Alethea, who had never forgiven her father's second marriage, held her half-sister in that kind of modified estimation in which a pet dog might hold a clouded diamond, or a sportsman a half-bred retriever.

Years went by; and as the girls grew to womanhood their individualities became more and more apparent. In due time the Honorable Miss Holme-Pierrepoint, being of an age to take her place in society, was presented at court by her aunt, the Countess of Glastonbury, and thereafter went in the ordinary fashion that prevailed in the days of George the Third. Before the close of that season she was engaged to Harold Wyrecwyse, Earl of Castlecourt, and early in the spring time of the following year, while her young sister was yet in the school-room, the betrothed Alethea was married from her aunt's house in Somersetshire, where the ceremony was privately performed by the Bishop of Bath and Wells.

In the mean while it was arranged that Lord Holmes's younger daughter was to be spared all those difficult duties which must have been a matrimonial choice. Her lot was cast for her. She was to marry Captain Holme-Pierrepoint, of Sowerby.

A more simple and admirable scheme could not have been devised. Captain Holme-Pierrepoint was her father's heir, and it was of course desirable that Elizabeth's dowry should remain in the family. Captain Holme-Pierrepoint was a young man to form a very favorable opinion of his lady's character. He was a man who got through a great deal of solid reading in the year; who weighed in a balance, and talked pompously," was a strict disciplinarian, and had "views" on the subject of education. In addition to these qualifications it may be added that Captain Holme-Pierrepoint was still handsome, and only forty-eight years of age.

Incredible as it may seem, however, Lord Holmes's second daughter was by no means so happy as she ought to have been in the contemplation of her destiny. Like most very young girls she had already dreamed dreams, and she would not have objected to accept Captain Holme-Pierrepoint as the realization of that ideal lover whom her imagination had delighted to picture. Her loving nature only needed something to cling to, something to live for, something to worship; but she knew that she could not deeply live for, or cling to, or worship Captain Holme-Pierrepoint. Above all, she shrank from the prospect of having her future formed according to his educational "views."

In order, therefore, to avoid this terrible contingency she resolved that Holme-Pierrepoint should deliberately rejected her destiny, and ran away with her drawing-master.

It was a desperate blow to the pride of the whole Pierrepoint family. The Talbots and the Wynecelyffes were of opinion that Lord Holmes was simply insane when he had sown, and that nothing better was to be expected from the daughter of a nameless governess; but Lord Holmes himself regarded the matter in a very different light. Harsh and eccentric as he was, this old man had loved his younger child well, but now his whole heart hardened toward her, and he swore that he would never see her, or speak to her, or forgive her while he lived. For having formally disinherited her, he desired that her name should be mentioned in his presence no more.

As for Lady Castlecourt, her resentment was no less bitter. She, too, never spoke or spoke to her half-sister again. She did not suffer, it is true, as her father had suffered. Her heart was not wrung by the bitterness of regret that is less heart to be wrung; but her pride was even more deeply outraged. Neither of them made any effort to conceal their hostility. They merely blotted her name from their family records; burned, unread, the letters in which she implored their forgiveness, and behaved in all respects, not as though she were dead, but as though she had never existed.

In the mean while Elizabeth Holme-Pierrepoint had fled to Italy with her husband. He was a very young man—mere student—rich in hope, poor in pocket, and an enthusiast in all that concerned his art. But enthusiasm is as frequently the index of taste as the touch-stone of talent, and Edgar Rivière, with all his exquisite feeling for form and color, his worship of the antique, and his idolatry of Raffaelle, lacked the one great gift that makes poet and painter—he had no creative power. He was a correct draughtsman and a brilliant colorist; but, wanting "the vision and the faculty divine," wanted just all that divides elegant mediocrity from genius. He believed in himself, however, and his wife believed in him; and for years he struggled on, painting ambitious pictures that never sold, and earning a scanty subsistence by copying the Raffaelles he so dearly loved. At last, however, the bitter truth forced itself upon them, and he knew that he had deceived himself with hopes destined never to be realized. But the discovery came too late. Long years of unrequited effort had impaired his health and bowed his spirit within him, and he had no heart left of that high courage which would once have armed him against all "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune." He did not long survive the wreck of his ambition. He died in Florence, literally of a broken heart, some fifteen years after his romantic marriage with Elizabeth Holme-Pierrepoint, leaving her and one surviving child wholly unprovided for.

Such were the destinies of these half-sisters, and such the family history of which William Trefalden gave Saxon a meagre outline, after his consultation with Abel Kockwitch.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

WHAT THEY SAID AT THE CLUB.

"AND now, Saxon," said Mr. Trefalden, "I can tell you something beyond the fact that Edgar Rivière died in Florence some three or four years since; but I think we need have no difficulty in assuming the parentage and identity of your dressed damsel. I imagine that her mother must have been left simply destitute; and in this case Lady Castlecourt's behaviour would, of course, do something to keep her from starvation. I doubt, however, that her charity went beyond that point."

"But, good Heavens!" exclaimed Saxon, who was now pacing up and down the room in a fever of indignation, "it is only in her own sister, cousin William! her own sister!"

"Her half-sister; but, even so, it is too bad."

"Too bad! Why it's monstrous! If I were Castletowers—"

"I do not suppose that Lord Castletowers has ever been aware of the existence of these people," interrupted the lawyer.

"Then he ought to hear of it!"

"Not from your lips, young man. You have stumbled on a family secret, and, right or wrong, you are bound in honor to respect it. If Lady Castlecourt keeps a skeleton in her private closet, it is not your place to produce that skeleton and to flaunt it in the face which she invites you."

"I am afraid that's true," replied Saxon; "but I wish I might tell Castletowers all the same."

"You may tell him nothing of the kind," said Mr. Trefalden, emphatically. "It is in your power to give great assistance to two unfortunate ladies, and what is to hinder you from doing it?"

"I can not be content to stand by and see injustice done," exclaimed Saxon. "They have been cruelly wronged."

"Even so, my dear fellow, you are not Don Quixote."

"I am young man bit his lip.

"Don Quixote's name," said he, "is too often taken in vain. Every forlorn hope that any nineteenth-century-people should come to apply it to the simple love of right! It seems to me that the world over here thinks a man a victim of politeness than justice. It's not so in Switzerland. And now, cousin William, how am I to help them?"

"You must allow me time to consider," replied Mr. Trefalden. "It will require delicate management."

"I know it will."

"But I will think the matter over, and write to you about it to-morrow."

"The sooner the better," said Saxon.

"Of course you need with regard to your?"

"With regard to money, do the best you can for them. I don't care how much it is."

"Suppose it were to draw over for a hundred thousand pounds!" said the lawyer, with a smile.

"I'm not afraid of that; but I do fear that you may not use my purse freely enough."

"I will try, at all events," replied Mr. Trefalden; whereupon Saxon thanked him, and cordially, and put out his hand to say good-by.

"You don't inquire how the company is going on," said the lawyer, detaining him.

"I am afraid I had forgotten all about the company," laughed Saxon. "But I suppose it's all right."

"Yes, we are making way," replied his cousin. "Capital people in the city and shareholders have every confidence in the direction. Our surveyors are still going over the ground; and we are next week dispatching a staff of assistants to Sidon, you may remember, will be our great Mediterranean depot, and we mean to open offices at Beyrouth as agent there without delay."

"Indeed!" said Saxon. "Is it still so great a secret?"

"It is a greater secret than ever."

"Oh—good-by."

"You are always in haste when business is the topic," said Mr. Trefalden. "Where are you going now?"

"To the club; and then back to Castletowers."

"You are making a long stay. What about the Continent?"

But Saxon was already half-way down the stairs, and seemed not to hear the question.

He then went direct to the Frenchmen, where he no sooner made his appearance than he found himself a centre of attraction. The younger men were eager for news of Italy, and, knowing whence he came, overwhelmed him with questions. What was Colonna doing? Was he likely to go out to Garibaldi? What were Garibaldi's intentions? Was Victor Emanuel favorable to the Sicilian cause? Would the war be carried into Naples and Rome? And, if so, did Colonna think that the Emperor of the French would take arms for the Pope? Was it true that Vaughan was about to join the army of liberation? Was it true that Lord Castlestowers would accompany the English contingent? Was it true that Saxon had himself accepted a commission And so on, till Saxon stopped his ears, and refused to hear another question.

"I am not in Signor Colonna's confidence," said he, "and I know nothing of his projects. But I do know that I have accepted no such commission, and I believe I may say the same for Castlestowers."

"And Vaughan?" said Sir Charles Burgoyne.

"Vaughan is going. He starts for Genoa to-night."

"I felt sure that was true," observed Greatrex, with a significant laugh. "I thought the fair Olimpia has promised to take pity on him."

Saxon turned upon him as if he had been stung.

"What do you mean?" he said, hotly. "What should Miss Colonna have to do with the matter?"

"Perhaps a great deal," replied the banker. "The gentleman gives his arm to the cause, and the lady rewards him with her hand. 'Tis a fair exchange."

"And Vaughan has worshiped for years at the Olimpian shrine," added Sir Charles.

"Besides," said another, "what else does he go for? We all know that he doesn't care a straw for Italy. It may be a forlorn hope, you know."

"More likely than not, I should say," replied Burgoyne. "Olimpian Colonna is a clever woman, and knows her own market value. She'll fly as higher game than a major of dragoons."

Saxon's face was burning all this time with anger and mortification. At last he could keep silence no longer.

"All this may be true," he said. "I don't believe it true; but at all events it is not in my power to contradict it. However, of one thing I am certain—that a crowded club-room is not the place in which a lady's name should be passed from mouth to mouth in this fashion."

"Your proposition is quite unexceptionable, in a general way," said the fair fellow, "and Burgoyne; but in the present instance it does not apply. Olimpia's name has figured for years in dispatches, petitions, committee-lists, and reports of all kinds, civil and military, it can surely bear the atmosphere of a crowded club-room."

"I don't think that has any thing to do with it," said Saxon, hastily. "Dispatches and petitions are public matters, and open to general discussion."

"But the probable marriage of a charming woman is a private matter, and therefore open to particular discussion," laughed the Guardsman. "If you are not, I can only say I by no means to hang myself on Miss Colonna's wedding-day."

Then the conversation turned again to Garibaldi and Victor Emanuel; and presently Saxon made his escape, and was on his way to the station.

He felt very moody and uncomfortable as he leaned back in his Hansom and sped down the Strand. He had heard much that was infinitely disagreeable to him during the brief hour spent at his club—much that he could not contradict, which he had been obliged to endure with comparative patience. That Olimpia's name should be thus familiar to every idle lip-servant of the profession; but that it should be coupled up with that of Vaughan and Castlestowers, and perhaps—who could tell?—with the names of a hundred other men whose political sympathies necessarily brought them into communication with her, was scarcilage pur et simple.

What man on earth was worthy of her, to begin with? Certainly not Major Vaughan, with his surface morality, his half-concealed cynicism, and his iron-gray beard. Not even Castlestowers, brave and honorable gentleman as he was. No —the only fit and appropriate husband for Olimpia Colonna would be some modern Da Guestin or Bayard; some man of the old times, like those soul would burn with a fire kindred to her own, with a love as great dead to be worthily bestowed, and lay his splendid laurels at her feet. But then lived there such a hero, young, handsome, daring, modest, successful in love and in battle, a man of men, sans peur et sans reproche?

Perhaps Saxon was secretly comforted by the conviction that only a prenx cheralier would be worthy of Miss Colonna, and that the prenx de chevalier was entirely not forthcoming.

In the midst of these reflections, however, he found himself once more at the station, with the express on the point of starting, and not a second to lose. To fling down his shillings, dash along the platform, and spring into a first-class carriage, just as the guard was running along the line and the driver beginning his preliminary whistle, was the work of a moment. As the door closed behind him, and he dropped into the nearest corner, a friendly voice called him by name, and he found himself face to face with Miss Hatherton.

CHAPTER XLIX.

ON THE PLATFORM.

"Well met by—well, not exactly by moonlight, Mr. Trefalden," said she, with that hearty, almost gentlemanly way of proffering her hand that always put Saxon so delightfully at his ease in her society. "Have you been shooting any more wooden-cocks, or smoking any more races since I saw you last?"

"No," replied Saxon, laughingly; "I have been more usefully employed."

"I rejoice to hear it. May I ask in what manner?"

"Oh, Miss Hatherton, if you rent particulars I'm lost! I'm only pleasantly conscious that I have been employed in doing nothing by myself. I fear it's rather a vague statement to put forward though."

"Terribly vague. At all events, you have not yet donned the red shirt?"

"Yes—at the school theatre," said Saxon, with an involuntary glance at the little blue horseshoes besprinkling the bosom of that garment in which his person happened to be adorned. "What do you mean?"

"I mean that you have not gone over to Garibaldi."

Garibaldi again! It seemed as if the air was full of the names of Garibaldi and Italy to-day! "Why, no, you too, Miss Hatherton!" he said. "I have heard more about Italian affairs since I have been in town this morning than I ever hear at Castlestowers. The men at the Erechtheum would talk of nothing else."

"I dare say not," replied the heiress. "The lookers-on have always more to say than the workers. But has not Miss Colonna enlisted you?"

"Indeed no."

"You amaze me. I could not have believed that she would have been so incredible forbearance toward a man of your inches. But perhaps you are intending to join in any case."

"I have no intention of the sort or the other," said Saxon; "but if any of our fellows were going I should like to join them."

"There is nothing I should enjoy so much, if I were a man," said Miss Hatherton. "Do you think you could get me a commission? I heard they were sorely in want of money the other day, and I seat them something—not much, but as much as I could spare."

"Oh, I believe the fund is getting on pretty well," replied Saxon, with some embarrassment. "You are a subscriber, then?"

"Yes—I have given something."

Miss Hatherton looked at him keenly.

"I should like to know what it was something was," said she. "I heard a strange rumor today—but I suppose you would not tell me if I were to ask you."

Saxon laughed, and shook his head.

"A rumor is generally known by a polite name for a lie," replied he; "you should never believe in one."

"Perhaps not," said Miss Hatherton, gravely. "I should be sorry to believe all—"

She checked herself, and added:

"If you do not tell me, Mr. Trefalden, you must be sure to let me know. I only marvel that Miss Colonna's eloquence has not been brought to bear upon you long before."

"Well, I'm not an Italian."

Miss Hatherton smiled, compassionately.

"My dear man," said she, "if you were a Thug, and willing to make your rosmal useful to the cause, Miss Colonna would persuade you. Nationality is nothing to them. All they want is a volunteer or a subscriber. Besides, plenty of your countrymen have gone over to Italy already."

"Are you sure of that?" asked Saxon, eagerly.

"As sure as that you never read the papers."

"You are quite right there," laughed he, "I never do."

"An English volunteer company is already formed," continued Miss Hatherton, "at Genoa."

"Yes—I know that."

"There are, then, I hear, be a German corps; and both Swiss and Hungarian corps are talked of."

Saxon nearly bounded off his seat.

"A Swiss corps!" he shouted. "A Swiss corps, and nobody ever breathed a word of this to me!"

"It's very odd," said Miss Hatherton.

"And that Vaughan should go to me so much about Italy yesterday morning!"

"Perhaps they do not care to make a collective of you, Mr. Trefalden," said the heiress.

"But they want soldiers!"

"True; but—"

"But they have!"

"Perhaps they stand more in need of the simple arm of war just now than of your individual muscles."

"The sinews of war!" stammered Saxon.

"He must be rich, indeed, who—"

"Of course I might get killed; but every volunteer risks that. Vaughan may get killed."

"He may; but I don't believe he will."

"Of course I might get killed; but every volunteer risks that. Vaughan may get killed."

"He may; but I don't believe he will."

Saxon looked blankly in Miss Hatherton's face.

"I—I really don't understand," said he.

"Do you wish me to explain my meaning?" said Miss Hatherton.

"Undoubtedly."

"There—excuse the illustration—it might not be politic to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs."

Saxon's face flamed with rage and mortification.

"Oh, Miss Hatherton!" he exclaimed, "how can you be so unjust, and so unchariable?"

Miss Hatherton smiled good-temperedly.

"I am a plain speaker, Mr. Trefalden," said she, "and plain speakers must expect to be called uncharitable sometimes. You need not be angry with me because I speak the truth."

"But indeed you're mistaken. It's not the truth, nor any thing like the truth."

"Nay," she replied, "I know the Colonnas better than you know them. Giulio Colonna is insatiable for money. Italy is insatiable for it. I deny that he is personally disinterested. He would give the coat off his back to buy powder and shot for the cause; but he would strip the coat from his neighbor's back for the same purpose without scruple."

"But, indeed—"

"But, indeed, Mr. Trefalden, you may believe me when I tell you that he would regard it as a sacred duty to fling every farthing of your fortune into this coming war, if he could get the handling of it. You will do well to beware of him."

"Then I am sure that Miss Colonna is not—"

"Miss Colonna is utterly dominated by her own enthusiasm and her father's influence. You must beware of her too."

"You will do well to beware of yourself next, Miss Hatherton," said Saxon, petulantly.

"No, my dear Sir, I shall do nothing of the kind. I like my money simply; but I neither covet your money, nor—— Do you know what people are saying about you and Miss Colonna? Bywhose way, is the train your station?"

"About me and Miss Colonna!" said Saxon, breathlessly.

"Yes—but this is certainly Sedgebrook. You must be quick, for they don't stop one moment."

"For Heaven's sake, Miss Hatherton, tell me first!"

"No, no—jump out, or you will be carried on. I'll tell you when we meet next autumn."

Saxon jumped out, but clung to the window with both hands.

"Now!" said he. "Now!"

"Well," replied Miss Hatherton, speaking somewhat slowly, and looking him full in the face; "they say that Miss Colonna—they say you are going to squander your fortune on Italy; marry Olimpia Colonna; and break Lord Castlestowers' heart."

But Saxon never heard the last five words at all. Before Miss Hatherton could bring her sentence to an end the shrill whistle drowned her voice, and the train began to move. The young man sprang back after it for some moments in blank bewilderment.

Squander your fortune on Italy, and marry Olimpia Colonna! He repeated to himself:

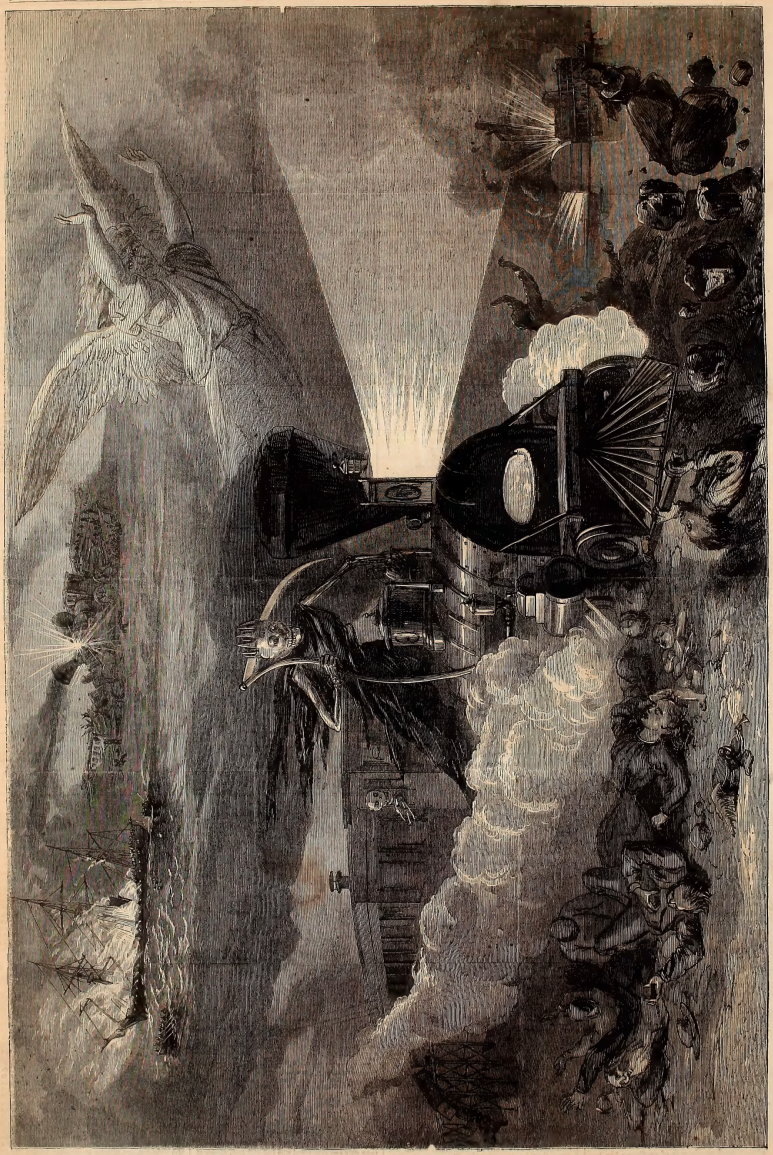
"Fly to Castletowers, Sir?" said the solitary fly-driver of the place, recognizing the Earl's livery.

But Saxon preferred to walk; so he took the short cut through the fields, and strode on with his head thrown back, and still ringing in his ears:

"Marry Olimpia Colonna!" he said, for the twentieth time, as he sat down presently upon a stile, and proceeded unconsciously to cut off the heads of the nearest dandelions with his cane. "Marry Olimpia Colonna! Good God! there isn't a prince on this earth half good enough for her! As for me, I'm only just worthy to be one of her soldiers! The stand notion! What a mad, preposterous notion!"

Mad and preposterous as it was, however, he could think of little else; and every now and then, as he loitered on his way through the pleasant meadows, he repeated, half aloud, those wondrous words:

"Marry Olimpia Colonna!"



INTERESTING ITEMS.

THE WANDERING JEW.—The legend of the Jew ever wandering and never dying—one from the crucifixion of Jesus to the present day, is spread over many European countries. It is known, however, as in all fables, to not agree. One version is this: When Jesus was led to death, opposite the house of Pilate, he fell down in the next himself near the gate at the house of Ahasuerus. This man, sorely vexed, called forth and thrust him away. Jesus turned toward him, saying, "I shall rest, but thou shall move on until I return." Hence this man can be has no rest, and is obliged incessantly to wander about. Another version is that he was the Porter of Pilate, a monk of the thirteenth century. When Jesus was led from the house of Pilate, he was met by this man, named Cartaphilous, pushed him from behind with his foot, saying, "Walk in, Jesus, walk in; why dost thou tarry?" Jesus looked at him gravely, and said, "I walk on, but thou shalt tarry till I come." Hence he still walks, and receives from place to place, in constant dread of the wrath to come. A third version is that this wandering Jew is a sick every hundred years, but recovers and resumes his wanderings. Some say he is seen in various places. He does not look much older than a septuagenarian. Thus Ahasuerus is the name of one of the ancient names of the Arabic—this wanderer. The first who reports such a thing is a monk of the thirteenth century, who, at that time, when the world was full of pious frauds, even to disgust. However, there is a man who says he has seen him, and, as he has come a proverb, "He tune about like a wandering Jew."

UNCLAIMED PRIZES.—The managers of lotteries could give some curious information concerning them. In one case, especially as regards the number of prizes that have never been claimed. The number is enormous, as may be guessed at in the majority of instances. There was a man, for example, who purchased a ticket in a lottery. A man who had frequently speculated in lottery tickets, and always without success. He purchased this ticket at the last determined not to risk any more money in it; but some months after he remembered that he had purchased it. Another ticket that he did so, but could not find it. He then set to work in the most methodical way to look through his papers, and found the ticket in the bottom of a drawer, and handed his friend in the street, who, it chanced, had just then called to see him, and was in the act of bidding him adieu, to go through the list of the prize remained unclaimed. The ticket was found, and he had not the slightest idea what it was. He then looked at the list, and found that it was the number that had won the thousand pounds' prize. He had not even looked at the number, and had not known what had become of it.

SIR SIDNEY SMITH.—The correspondent of the Glasgow Herald says:—"In times of little liberality, when some men, through God sent wealth, are comparatively those who did not exactly receive their creed, nor worship God in the same way as they did, and who were consequently persecuted his tenants because they had religious meetings in private houses, and one of the most unlikely persons, though he never molested them when they spent their money in the public-house. The Presbyterians, one of these people, went out one morning to the house of the Baronet's gamekeeper, and inquired to talk with him. The servant desired to know her message, and he would deliver her message to none but his master; and it was with a number of servants, who were consequently very intimately and alone. The servant having delivered this message, said that Sir Sidney was engaged at that time something on her mind, his worship condescended to see her. She then addressed him in the most kind, but laughingly, comforting tone. To which she answered, 'Sir, you are a handsome young man, and not without much virtue God according to our ain conscience, and to get us as we can, and give us peace, and we desire to be let alone; and gin ye gae, ahame, ye'll no ken what influence such people might have?' She then left him, and he had to go to prayer to the great, wisely took the old woman's advice, and ever let them alone."

THE CHANGING IN THE LUNAR CRATERS.—Astronomical questions is well known; the most trivial circumstance is noted; and there are books which have an enormous circulation which teach the signification of every object dreamed of. Thus, if a man dreams that he sees a crow flying, or a mouse running, or a woman nursing a baby, there are figures attached which he considers will make up a lucky number, and on which he therefore stakes his money. Apparently in the latter thing he is successful, for about, or some other writer, relates that when a soldier appeared himself at the top of a tree, and there made a general rush toward his body, not for the purpose of rendering him assistance, but in order to see what number was on his button.

THE HORRORS OF TRAVEL.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE NEW CITY HALL, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.—[See Page 590.]

A TRUE BILL.

EARLY on the morning of the fifteenth of April information reached the French police that the Baroness de C——— was lying dead in her bed, strangled with a piece of ribbon. She had been married as a widow to Baron de C——, and was about twenty-eight years old, very pretty, of engaging manners, and both she and her husband were known far and wide for lavish hospitality.

Three weeks before the murder the baron set out for Russia, where it was said that he inherited some property from a relative. During the absence of her husband the baroness kept very much at home, with Ernestine Lamont, a beautiful girl of the most innocent and simple manners, who had been educated and protected by her. On the night before the murder the baroness went to the Opera. Ernestine, who was very well, did not accompany her; neither did she sit up for her, as the baroness had a private key, and did not wish the young girl to be disturbed. It was the custom that when the baroness, on awaking in the morning, rang her bell, Ernestine went first to her bedroom. When, on the morning after the murder, no bell was heard to ring, the servants wondered, and at last one of them went up to Ernestine's room to ask the cause. She was empty. Thinking that she was gone, as usual, to the baroness's bedroom, the servant went thither. There the shades were still closed, and the night-lamp burning on a little table by the bedside. On the floor lay the lifeless body of Ernestine. The girl now covered her head; the other servants hurried up stairs, and on opening the shutters it was seen that the baroness lay dead, evidently strangled with a piece of ribbon, which was at once recognized as belonging to Ernestine, who was lying in a swoon on the floor.

On coming to herself, it was naturally supposed that she would be able to throw some light on the matter, but, to the surprise of all, she was in a nervous hesitation hardly to be reconciled with innocence. On further examination it was found that the secretary had been wide open, and that a variety of papers and other articles were lying about in confusion, as if the contents of each drawer had been hastily turned inside out. By this time the police had arrived. With scarcely a moment's hesitation they pronounced that one of the inmates of the house must either have committed the crime, or at least been an accomplice in it. Evidently, also, there had been robbery added to murder; and, therefore, it was thought right to search the boxes of each member of the household. The servants were all willing; but when it came to Ernestine's turn to deliver up her keys, the young lady showed a strange unwillingness to do so. Of course the police persisted, and a very little time elapsed before a large sum of money and several jewels belonging to the murdered lady carefully secreted at the bottom of her box.

"How does mademoiselle account for this money?" was the first question put to her.

"I do not know!—can not tell—pray—do not ask me," was the hesitating reply.

The suspicions already attached to her were now considerably strengthened, and the police only discharged their duty in arresting her. The case was tried, and Ernestine was almost found guilty.

A young lawyer named Bernard, whose knowledge of Ernestine's previous character made it very hard for him to believe her guilty, resolved to visit her. After some little difficulty permission was granted him to visit the condemned in prison. But if he would be either with any faith in her innocence he left the prison without doubt of her guilt. Her answers to his questions were evasive and unsatisfactory.

On reaching home late that evening he found a note lying on his table. It was from Ernestine, and ran as follows:

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—I feel that I owe you at least some explanation for my strange conduct, and will therefore confide you in possession of the facts of the case. It is only foretelling my intention. This letter would have been delivered you after my death. . . .

"You are aware of the circumstances which made me regard the baroness as my mother. You are aware of her husband's fatal propensity to the gaming-table, a passion which in a measure I had to be accustomed to between them. The baroness was very beautiful, and still young, and for long had lost love and affection which she had hoped her husband would show her, formed an unfortunate intrigue. I was horror-struck when she informed me of this, but it was not for me to tell you how. As might be expected no good could possibly result from this attachment. It was proved against her by the most fallacious, and concealed, whether by threats or by menaces I know not, in obtaining from her large sums of money. It was but a few days before her death that she confided this to me, and at the same time begged me to take care of her jewels and money for her by me, as no one should get her secret lover should obtain possession of them. The last time I saw her was on the night on which she left the Opera. At what hour she returned I know not, for she always had a private key with her. . . . The rest you know.

"Hence, dear friend, you will understand my reluctance to have my name searched, and my evasive answers as to the money and jewels found in them.

"Had I told the truth should I have been believed? No! And have I not by my delay told another falsehood? the good name of one who has been more than a mother to me? Indeed, I did not know even the name of my secret lover, and I had never seen him. No: it is better as it is. I am ready to die. My secret is safe with me, and die with me. That you believe in my innocence is the only comfort I have left me.

"Your unhappy friend,
"ERNESTINE."

"Thank God!" murmured the young man, pressing the paper to his lips. "Henceforth I will devote my life to prove your innocence to the world. God grant it may not yet be too late!"

Late though it was, Bernard at once repaired to the prefect's house, and after some difficulty procured admission. The prefect fortunately happened to be an old friend of Bernard's father, and it was because of this that the young man was admitted at so late an hour.

"But, my good friend," said the old man, after patiently listening to all he had to say, "believe me, it is a useless task; there is no doubt that the young woman is guilty either as principal or as accomplice. Still, as you so earnestly wish it, you shall be permitted to examine the apartments of the murdered lady. And now good-night," he added, with a smile, "and let me hear the result of your investigations."

Early the next morning Bernard, accompanied by a gendarme, repaired to the baroness's house. Every thing lay exactly as it had been left on the fatal morning; for the house had been and was still in the custody of the police. Not a drawer nor a cupboard escaped Bernard's notice. There was no violence visible on the windows, as if forcible admission had been effected by the baroness. Nothing, in fact, presented itself which gave the slightest clew to the mystery.

The search had now occupied several hours, and Bernard felt that it was useless to remain there any longer. With a sigh of heavy heart he rose, and proceeded to leave the apartment. But in passing out into the entrée, which was quite dark, his foot struck something, which, stooping down, he found to be a hat. Thinking it belonged to the baron, he was about to hang it up with the others on the rack when he chanced to look at its inner lining.

"That hat, monsieur, if you please; I do not remember to have seen it before. It is strange," remarked the gendarme, looking at Bernard in a questioning manner, as if he thought that hung up in the entrée; "it is larger, and of a different shape to the others."

"Let me have it, my good friend; I will show it to the prefect as soon as I return—perhaps belonging to this secret lover of the murdered lady!" thought Bernard to himself, as he hurriedly drove to the prefecture.

Ernestine was anxiously expecting to see her friend, for he had promised to visit her that day again; and she wished to learn from him on this eve who ther she still believed in her innocence.

"Do you know this hat, Ernestine?" said Bernard, on entering the cell.

"That hat—good Heavens!—it is the very hat which the baron had on the night he left Paris," replied Ernestine, in an excited manner.

"Impossible!—we compared it with the other hats—and this is much larger. I believe it belonged to the baroness's lover—"

"No—no—a thousand times no—it is the baron's hat he took with him. I know it well; it is much larger for him, and he asked me to put some wadding under the lining for him—see—if it be not there!"

"But, Ernestine, it must be fancy on your part —this hat never belonged to the baron. But—"

"Quite right," added Ernestine, as, on turning up the lining, the wadding fell out, and with it a piece of paper which had been used to add a little to the size. It was a bill written by the hand-writer of a hotel at Strasburg, made out in the baron's name, for one month's board and lodging. It was dated April 7—just fourteen days after his departure from Paris.

Ernestine and Bernard looked at each other for a few moments in silence, as strange thoughts passed through the mind of each.

"And it was the baron's hat was now proved—but how did it come there? Had he returned to Paris secretly before the murder? Was he the murderer?

Ernestine turned deadly pale.

"Do you suppose that the baron—" she gasped.

"I do not suppose," added Bernard, finishing the sentence. "Yes! I do. But I will go at once to the prefect."

For the first time since her condemnation a faint ray of hope was kindled in Ernestine's heart. The sight of Bernard, her old friend, after so long delay, had indeed excited a wish to live in her young breast.

"How thankful I am I did not say any thing at the trial. The good God will protect me!"

Bernard now left the prison and hastened to the house of the prefect.

"Well! and what did you find?" asked the old man, smiling sadly at the young friend who rushed into the room without waiting to be announced.

"Do good enough to examine this bit," said Bernard, as he handed him the hat, and recounted to him the manner in which he had found it, and what Ernestine had subsequently told him.

"Ah! monsieur, you have been robbed! Yes, it is plain—and we have been accusing an innocent girl!" ejaculated the prefect, carefully examining the hat. "Yes, it is larger than the others, and further. But let me urge secrecy on you, and depend on me."

Early the next morning Bernard was again sent for to the prefect's house.

"I have carefully gone over the whole evidence since you left me," he said, "having been given to understand that there is a very strong suspicion against the baron. I have caused inquiries to be made, and have ascertained that he returned to Paris secretly, and that his journey to Peterburg was probably only a ruse to avoid suspicion. The affair looks very like a mystery, and must proceed very cautiously. The baron stands very high in the public esteem, and it seems incredible that he could be guilty of so terrible and horrible a crime. Still that hat and the bill of the landlord made out in his own name prove at least that he was in Paris on the night of the 28th. Why should he return? What was the motive? However, I have dispatched an agent of the secret police to Strasburg to track his steps from that place. You shall hear any thing I will send for you."

On arriving at Strasburg the police agent at once repaired to the Maison Rouge. The landlord perfectly remembered the baron's having staid at his hotel for a week, and the day he left, whither he could not say. The porter, however, remembered where his luggage was taken. It was to a house outside the city, on the road to Saverne, where a hired carriage was in readiness. He got into the carriage and drove off. But as the driver was an acquaintance of the porter's, it was no difficult matter to find him. He remembered the job perfectly, and was surprised that the baron should leave Thionville. He should not perhaps have paid much attention to this fact had he not a sister living at Saverne as chambermaid in the same hotel to which he drove his fare. On inquiring at Saverne the agent found that a Monsieur Thionville had arrived at the hotel as stated, and that he had remained there four days, during the greater part of which he had kept indoors from indisposition.

The description the landlord gave of his person and luggage left no doubt on the agent's mind that he was on the right track. But nothing further could be learned. Still, one important circumstance had been proved—namely, that, instead of proceeding on his journey to Russia, he had turned back on the road to Paris, after an assumed illness.

The only thing that now remained to be done was to get an advertisement in the French and German papers inviting the landlord of the murdered lady to repair to Paris, in order to claim the property of his deceased wife. For, it was argued, if he had murdered her for the sake of getting possession of her money, it was very probable that he would take the last step to get it out. Neither did this surmise prove to be incorrect.

Two months or thereabouts had elapsed, and the police were beginning to despair of getting "other" tidings of the baron, when a gentleman, att...ed in deep mourning, and apparently bowed down with great grief, presented himself at the bureau of the police. "He had," he said, "by chance seen the fearful tidings of his wife's murder in a paper at St. Petersburgh, and had returned to Paris as quickly as he could. The shock, however, it had caused him had brought on a severe attack of illness, from which he had only just recovered, otherwise he should have returned to Paris some weeks sooner."

The baron, having given the orders of his chief, the agent referred the baron to a comptoir, where he would be furnished with the register of the death and burial of his wife.

On entering the room the baron was politely invited to take a seat while the necessary papers were being found.

After the lapse of a quarter of an hour an official entered the room, and requested the baron to accompany him to another comptoir, where, to his dismay, he found himself submitted to a rigorous examination.

"But, Monsieur le Baron, when you left home, on March 25, whither did you travel?" asked the chief officer.

"I traveled through Germany, en route for St. Petersburg."

"Indeed! But which was the first town at which you staid?"

"Strasburg!"

"Quite true!" said his questioner, referring to some papers. On what day did you arrive there?"

"On the 28th."

"And you have long did you remain?"

"Let me see—yes! it was one night and half the next day," replied the baron, with a little hesitation in his manner.

"And where did you proceed to next?" resumed the officer.

After some reflection the baron answered that he had gone to Frankfort.

"Pardon me," observed the officer, raising his eyes, and directing a steady glance toward the baron. "To Frankfort! I think you are mistaken. You remained at Strasburg from the 28th, where you remained till the following day. But the landlord of the Maison Rouge says that you remained at his house till the 30th. How do you account for this, Monsieur le Baron?"

"For one week? Yes! now I think of it, you are quite right, Monsieur; for I met several friends there, who persuaded me to lengthen my visit."

"You also state that you went to Frankfort. But, if Monsieur le Baron reflects, he will remember that he went to Saverne in a close carriage."

"Yes: but it was only a day's trip, and had nothing to do with my journey," was the ready answer. "But may I ask, Monsieur, why all these questions?"

"Excuse me, Monsieur le Baron, you are here to answer questions, not to ask them. Suffice it to say, it is required under such circumstances. Be pleased to attend. You said just now it was only a day's trip, I think. How was it you came to stay there for the night?"

"I had only intended to remain one day at Saverne, but was taken ill during my stay at the hotel."

"Was that why Monsieur le Baron changed his name?" continued the officer.

"Change my name! Monsieur must be in error."

"Not at all. You took the name of Thionville, for some reason best known to yourself. But as you seem to have forgotten this circumstance, will you kindly address to tell us where you went on leaving Saverne?"

"I returned to Strasburg."

"Monsieur le Baron, I warn you, and allow me to refresh your memory. You went, or pretended to go, to a private house in the neighborhood. But you left it on the night of your journey, and did not arrive here about April 15?"

"Monsieur!" exclaimed the baron. "I have answered enough of your questions quite long enough. By what right you presume to interrogate me against my consent you know I do not know. Rest assured I shall represent the matter to the Minister of Police. I wish you a very good-morning." And the baron turned himself round to leave the room.

"Not so fast, Monsieur. I have not yet done with you," continued the officer, without noticing the interruption. "I repeat—you arrived in Paris about the 15th, and you were in your wife's bedroom on the night of the 15th and 16th."

At these words the baron leaped to his feet, his face distorted with the pangs of fear and passion.

"Calm yourself, Monsieur le Baron, I have not finished with you yet. Will you then explain, if you were not there that night, what you were on the night in question—which you will remember was the very night on which she was murdered—how it was your hat was found in the passage?" And the baron was thunderstruck, he had lost to the bone.

All eyes were bent upon him. The baron turned deadly pale, and remained speechless for a considerable time. At last he stammered forth incoherently:

"It is not my hat. I never saw this one before I had one like it—but not this."

"Not this!" exclaimed the relentless questioner. "Monsieur le Baron, you have been followed step by step from the time you quitted Paris to the day you returned. If this hat be not yours, then have the goodness to tell us how your bill incurred at the Maison Rouge, Strasburg, came to be under-neath the lining?"

"Hotel bill!" gasped the baron, as he struck his forehead with his clenched hand.

"Yes! wretched man. By that little piece of paper Providence has decidedly proved your crime, and has prevented an innocent girl from dying a felon's death. Confess that you entered your wife's room and committed the diabolical deed for which you would have allowed another to suffer."

But such a confession was never made.

That night Baron de C——— was safely shut up in prison till his trial should take place. All Paris was in a ferment when the news that the wife of the baroness had been discovered, and that he was no other than her own husband. But that night the prisoner escaped. On entering the cell on the following morning he was found lying stretched out on his couch, cold and stiff. It was supposed that, knowing his case to be hopeless, he had been in the habit of carrying poison about him.

Years have elapsed since the above events took place. Monsieur Bernard soon became one of the most celebrated advocates of the Parisian bar, and his wife, née Ernestine Lamont, noted not only for the brilliancy of her balls and dinners, but for the affability of her manner and the courteousness of her disposition. Of the story of the murder nobody knows more than is here told.

HUMORS OF THE DAY

REASON FOR THE HOT WEATHER.—A nice old lady of our acquaintance is positive that the thicker it becomes that a little quicksilver in a glass tube can make such awful weather by just raising it an inch or so.

The "Home of Compassion" is the name for the newest swindling dodge under the disguise of charity which has risen in its appearance in London.

HOW CURLIDGE!—The mismanagement of the Atlantic Cable is distinctly proved by the Attention of those on board the Great Eastern, that they have left it in charge of buoys!

A COD-CUTE-DUCK.—What's the difference between a soldier who is discharged honorably and one who is discharged with contempt? The fore'll discharge his musket, the second couldn't get his discharge.

Do not meddle with what does not concern you. Recollect that when the hounds are furiously fighting for a bone, it is not safe for us as jackall pass they set off together in pursuit of him.

ADVICE TO PARENTS.—The child's mind is like a virgin sheet of letter-paper; and its address in after-life will depend entirely upon the way in which you direct it.

A man has just taken out a patent for luminous hats. They would, he says, preserve the wearers from being run over at night, and, to some extent, enable a saving in the lighting of streets.

A NICE THING OF IT.

They give boys every old sound nowadays: "What Will He Do With It?" "Out of the Depths." "Such Stuff as Dreams are," and the like.

A dry fellow stepped into a bookseller's shop the other day, and asked the shopman,

"Have you got the 'Woman in White?'"

"Yes," replied the man.

"All Alone?" said the inquirer.

"Yes," repeated the shopman.

"Is the Dark?" still queried the stranger.

"Yes, sir, that's the title of the book," said the man.

"Well, all I've got to say is," retorted the questioner, as he turned to go out, "you've got a deuce of a long title of it. Good-by!"

The stranger was in a very low state at last accounts, but it is hoped that careful nursing will bring him "Out of the Dark."

INGENIOUS ENTHUSIOLOGICAL DISCOVERY.—We are more than pleased to have it in our exclusive power to state—and the statement will probably allay the fears of many an over-excited, fervid member of the Church—that the "Sacred Cause" is not "sand-frauded." Sand of Sanctum! turns out, after all, to be no other than that harmless creature known to all showmen, such as Barnum and the like, as "The Talking Fish."

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.

THAT was a joyous, hopeful morning, that 23d July, in the kingdom of Kerry, and over all the adjacent royalty of the island of Valentia, for from the recondite Bay of Ertchumonrus there was to go forth a thread across the sea, down in the depths of the Atlantic, to take up the warp and woof of the web with which these remote Irishry have bound themselves to the Western world. There was indeed a microcosm on the edge of the cliffs, and people of very different condition and degree had been attracted there by the influence of the Atlantic cable. There sat the lady of May Fair in the affected coarseness of her sea-side finery, watching the beat of the sidling wave on the boulders at her feet, and around her wide-eyed in fluttering rags wandered and wondered the unkempt children of the nation, gathering and eating sea-weed from the rocks. The London millionaire sauntered through the crowd of weather-beaten coast-guard men, half fishermen, half boatsmen, who struggle generation after generation against the ungrateful soil and the wild seas for half a livelihood. Dandy capitalists as they lay on the sward (the contrast of circles of rustic animals and kilted soldiery) and grouped around them a hum of Erse. The most ancient type of pig known to these isles scratched his long line of rattling ribs against the newest form of telegraph posts. Beside the hut, almost as destitute of internal comfort as an Indian wigwam, rose the smart telegraph house, stored with the nicest instruments for measuring the subdued lightning. All the energy, polish, and specialties of civilization was there in close contact with the lassitude, gaunt uncouthness, and passive indifference of a race which is now animated only by the hopes of bulls and emigrants.

It was a serious disappointment to the many who had journeyed a hundred miles for the sight, that the Great Eastern did not come to Valentia or close inshore. But they are used to disappointments, even in potatoes. Nor did the steamer long give them a chance; but the Hawk and the Caroline rolled thrice as much as any vessels else could do; and because the Agamemnon ballasted-and-bunked yacht was there, so that what with a few yachts and the pleasant presence of the chief secretary, and strange Saxon cabbiens in knickerbockers, and fair Saxon ladies in kirtles, and some streaks of smoke on the horizon, there was really a good deal of interest and excitement provided for the masses on the occasion. It was a great thing to see the shore-end carried up into the telegraph-house, and many forms of the nose were obtained in curious planes against the windows, in order to keep the eager eyes fixed on the operators, who were then generally engaged in operating on masts and drinks. It was greater still to behold that famous roller, the Caroline, steam out westward, trailing the shore-end after her, till the ran below the horizon altogether. The Knight of Kerry—hospitable, gracious Lord of Valentia, who has faith in some unproven theorem that the cable will work much good to his kingdom—works as hard as if the good would at once come to pass. And at last the time comes when the Great Eastern is to begin her functions, and the operation of laying the Atlantic cable really commences. Only a few words are now necessary to understand what that operation was—correct some errors, and make a few reflections, premising that our readers are supposed to be fully acquainted with the details of the Diary published in the newspapers. The cable stowed in the Great Eastern was of a form recommended by a committee of scientific and practical men. There was not a moment during which it was let alone, and on all occasions it responded to the tests. Therefore it was considered so perfect that "a fault" was not expected to occur in the laying down. There are people around who don't know what "a fault" is—who are ignorant of the meaning of "dead earth." Let us explain—

When the insulation of the core of the cable is perfect there is a certain amount of resistance to the passage of an electric current through it which is measured by the delicate Thomson reflecting magnet, to which is attached a tiny mirror, so placed as to catch the light of a lamp through a small aperture, and to reflect it on a graduated scale. This is a description of Thomson's galvanometer. The movement of the light measures the opposition encountered by the current in going right through, and when the resistance is diminished very much the magnet is proportionately deflected by the increased flow of electricity, and the light moves to the extremity of the scale or vanishes off it altogether. Now if an injury be done to the insulation, so that the copper is exposed to the action of a conducting body, the escape of the current takes place from the hole in accordance with certain laws, and less —part going off to the conductor and part continuing its course along the copper to the end of the cable. The latter is at once detected by the galvanometer, and the electricians know "a fault" has occurred. Sometimes the electro-chemical current or temporary deposit of the water at the point of the injury mends the fault; and if the wound be not very large, as no fault is known to exist in the quality of the conducting medium, there is generally enough of current to transmit signals. But, as a rule, the tendency of "faults" is to increase rapidly, so that a cable in which one is detected can not be considered at all safe, and may indeed become useless in a moment. "Dead earth" is the worst fault. It means that an injury has been caused to the gutta percha of such a nature that a perfect contact has been established between the copper and some other good conductor; and in that case all the current passes away, and the galvanometer indicates that there is no resistance to its passage—the insulation of the cable being destroyed so that no message whatever can be sent. There is then no course to be pursued when "dead earth" occurs but to take up the cable and remove the injured portion; and if that can be done, the electricians know perfectly and consider the portion which is laid as useless for electrical purposes. In the case of "a fault," the judgment of the electrician is often at fault also, and they have to decide whether it is of such a description as to render it imperative for the engineers to undertake the task of picking up the cable and taking it out, or if it can be worked through with resistance and retardation. It is for them to form a decision they generally try to "break down" the fault, as it is called, by increasing the battery power as much as it is safe to do so, so as to "force" the action of the current; in which case the cable must be taken up, and if they fail, they may work through the wire with a diminished number of words.

By wonderful application and close watching, by the nicest calculations, by exquisite instruments, by fabulous delicacies in the manufacture of best, of water-pressure, of conductivity, of induction, of the subtlest physical laws are reduced to appreciable spaces, secretions are made to account for up to the "fault" or "dead earth" miles and miles away in the depths of the Atlantic, and to within a few inches and its magnitude. Then "picking up" is resorted to. When the "fault" or "dead earth" is found to be beyond the power of the signals at once the injured piece is removed, and a splice and joint are made between the severed ends of the cable. This is done by the core being cut away, the strands to a neat section like the splices of a fishingrod, soldering them over, binding the splice with fine wire, and then, by carefully and slowly covering it with layer after layer of gutta percha and Chatterton's non-conducting compound till it is as fit as ever it was to the purposes of protecting wire covered with manilla drawn down and twisted together over it, so as to make the whole resemble the original cable. That done, the cable is handed over to the engineers, who resume the process of paying out.

The gentlemen who have charge of the arrangements and testing of the cable was Mr. de Sauty, the experienced electrician of the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company, assisted by Mr. Saunders, Mr. Willoughby Smith, and other able and zealous officers of the company's staff. The cable was manufactured at the works of Mr. Canning, engineer of the company, who superintended the paying out of the cable, and who was charged with the control of the whole expedition; and next to him was Mr. Clifford, who was the head of the mechanical department. The various gentlemen were assisted by Messrs. Temple and an able and experienced staff, and had under their orders a corps of cable-layers, smiths, artificers, and skillful mechanics of all kinds. Captain Anderson, one of the officers of the Cunard line of steamers, was in command of the Great Eastern; and as he rightly considered that in critical moments all his attention would be demanded by the management of the vast ship, application was made to the Lords of the Admiralty for the assistance of an officer who would be responsible to them. Captain Moriarty, of the Commander Moriarty, of the Far, whose services on board the Agamemnon, in 1858, ought to make his name familiar to the public, was allowed leave of absence for the purpose of giving his aid to Captain Anderson. They worked together with the utmost zeal and harmony; and in all their calculations, made under the greatest difficulties, agreed within a few seconds as to the ship's position after drifting in unknown currents amidst fogs and storm.

There were two companies represented on board. The Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company had chartered the Great Eastern to lay the cable they had contracted to put down from Valentia to Newfoundland for the Atlantic Telegraph Company, and whose officers had the sole control of the expedition and all matters connected with it; but on the completion of the work the representatives of the Atlantic Telegraph Company took possession of the cable and came into power.

Mr. Varley, formerly known as an electrician, was strictly enjoined not to interfere or to express any opinion concerning any of the operations in the testing-room. He was placed on board, but not even to give his advice if he were asked for it, unless the demand were made in writing, and in that case he was only to answer in writing. He was placed in the written document a distinct declaration th t the opinion so given was not in any way to bind the company which he represented. Professor W. Thomson, of Glasgow, whose name is known over Europe, and who is certainly one of the most distinguished electricians of his time in the world, was admitted on board as a sort of scientific side-camp to the Great Eastern, but was not to depart from his course indicated by the board to his principal. Mr. Field, as director of the New York board, and general representative of the company, was in possession of the test messages inclosed in sealed envelopes, which were to be opened as soon as the cable was declared to be complete for their transmission. So there were two gentlemen full of suggestions and ideas and formulas, reduced to silence—two great guns, loaded to the muzzle, but charged to the muzzle. They were nigh bursting, and no wonder; for be-write, too, if they were driven to resent unconsciously the position in which they were placed by large speculative discourses in private, and by rigid critical reviews in the public press, they became seems a consorial character. In the gravest discussions they held no part. The only way in which they could give utterance to their feelings was by asking questions.

Captain Hamilton, one of the directors of the Atlantic Company, was stationed at Valentia to receive the test messages and to enter on possession of the station at Ferhumonrus as soon as the task of the continuous cable was done. Mr. Booth represented the Great Eastern directors on board the ship. Among the passengers not directly engaged in the operations were Mr. Appold, Inspector, of Paris, the author of a scheme for laying an Atlantic cable from the Pembroke coast to Aucres and St. Pierre, America; Dr. W. H. Russell, engaged to write a history of Atlantic telegraphy, and who subsequently acceded to the post of the Secretary of the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company to compile a Diary of the proceedings on board; Mr. E. Duffery, who is the only writer of the book; Mr. C. Deane; Mr. H. O'Neil, the distinguished painter of "Eastward, Ho!" and "Westward, Ho!" and several young gentlemen, to whom, in various capacities, the directors had granted passages. As Mr. Seward was in a restive mood, he would not accompany Professor Faraday, who was sent by United States man-of-war to accompany the expedition; but as the chief engineer, Mr. Canning, directed the work English, and the companies English, their absence was only to be regretted as an indication of Mr. Seward's love of the antipathetic.

The Admiralty commissioned H.M.S. Terrible, Captain Napier, to accompany the Great Eastern, and ordered H.M.S. Sphinx, Captain Y. Hamilton, destined for the North American station, to proceed across in company, and to take soundings for the use of the steamers. The Admiral Hope was directed to station vessels off Trinity Bay to meet it, and to render the undertaking all the aid in his power. The Admiralty thing seemed to proceed well, and as one of the directors said, "if we fail to lay the cable, it will not be owing to some trifling circumstance we can not foresee or guard against." The Great Eastern was in good condition for the voyage, and with the small extra repairs to her boilers, and the removal of many tons of mussels and barnacles from her bottom, to make her in the best possible form for speed and stability. Her fuel was, however, reefed, so that her maximum speed was not more than nine knots an hour, which was a few knots under the usual rate at which she was intended to pay out the cable. Provisions in abundance—meat, salt and fresh, fish, vegetables, yards of poultry, geese, and ducks, tons of ice, furnished materials for monster bills of fare; and the crowing of cocks, the cackling of geese, the bleating and bahing of sheep, the cackling of geese and quacking of ducks intermingled strangely with the puffing and blowing of the steam-engines, and the hum and rush of the great Atlantic waves which seethed around us. As for the lowing of kine and oxen, it was none; and as for the mountain cane on the cattle, which were killed to save their lives day after day, till nor one was left. We did not know that our course that a pestilence had broken out among the bovinia in England.

The decks of the ship were perforated with more chimneys than I could ever count. They seemed to grow and die in the course of a night—one here, another there. The funnels-cranes stood up stiffly, as if they had mistaken the ship for a quay-wall, and had got on board by accident. Carpenters' benches, forges, anvils, were mixed up with a fortress of boats, all got in board (except two for fear of "a man overboard"), in order to be out of the way of the cable stoppers all over the deck; and, turn which way we might, it was nigh hopeless to try and evade the volumes of smoke which were hurled out of smoke-stacks and funnels, bow, amidship, and astern. The first evening of our starting was distinguished by that the rumble of one chimney as the cable flew out was too pronounced at first to be agreeable. That, however, was so monotonous and regular that we soon grew used to it, and at length felt as if it was much the style of the wheels revolving and jockeys jumping up and down was positively agreeable and exhilarating. And when the noise ceased, and the wheels stood still astern, there was gloom in the ship, as when the engine itself becomes meticulous in some ill-fated craft with a lee-shore not far distant. Prospectively to our confidence and good spirits was the knock which came early next morning, when the stoppage of the vessel woke every sleeper, and words. "There's a fault overboard," at once displayed the intelligence that the Great Eastern was about to run over in one easy, uninterrupted course to Trinity Bay. There was a gathering around the testing-room, in which the batteries and wire ends and galvanometers are worked, and which is darkened by curtains in order that the ray from the mirror above mentioned may be watched more easily. Then as time were on, and, as it appeared, the electricians did not know, owing to the varying nature of the fault, whether it existed 20 or 40 miles away, or indeed whether it was not at the shore-end close to Valentia, a feeling of disappointment and doubt began to arise, which was not at all decreased when it was decided to haul up the cable till the fault was discovered. By a few hours' study and observation we had become accustomed to one process, and the mode in which it was effected, and we had no intention to see the reverse operation.

When all was ready the word was given to "cut the cable," and the executioner, having a sharp saw in his hand, approached his unconscious victim as it reposed somewhere in the neighborhood of the jockey-wheels, and with two or three raps divided the iron sheath and copper armature, so that the seaward end was drawn astern, and then with chain and hawser was passed over the iron pulley at the dant always made one jump. But after a moment it was seen that the wire rope which sawed up and down through the stuffing-box was doing something or other. When the end was over, dippers were let go with much shouting from point to point of the ship. But the most astonished moment of the rope had to be let go after the cable ere the ship could be brought round with her bow to the point where the stern had been when the cable was first paved out; and it was quite necessary that her bow should be turned astern instead of westward before the picking-up operation was commenced, or the cable strain would have been dangerous. The wire rope being secured to the bows was always hauled in by the picking-up machinery when the proper position of the ship had been attained. This apparatus consisted of a series of V wheels, fixed vertical, and spur wheels, worked by two small steam-engines on the deck, which were supplied with steam by boilers at the side of the ship near the bows. There was a dynamometer and an indicator, and breaks and breakmen; but it seemed to me as if one of the engines, the lateral events, was an old offair, and the other, if new, certainly did not rejoice in youthful strength and vigor. Both were considered out of gear, and had to be helped with a handspike and an elastic bandage. It "paying out" very soon became monotonous, but "picking up" exciting and combined tediousness and feverish excitement to a degree never equaled except in some masterly surgical operation. To be a local spectator on solitary aisle on duty was visible near the stern, which had run a few months before established all the energy of official life, curiosity, and amateur observation of the floating town. To the bows they clustered, fathers and all, and gazed down on the black cable, which was always animated with a strenuous vis inertiæ, and fought as hard as the sea-serpent himself against the force which brought it over the wheel at the bow. There again Mr. Canning, Mr. Clifford, and their staff directed and regulated. Captain Anderson was now watched as if he was strained upward—now stood on the bridge, keeping his eye on the whole of the ship, and giving orders for her management, and the acoustic tube and whistle which was carried from the bow to the bridge communicated the word of command "to go ahead with the screw," or to "turn astern," or to "stop her," which the varying relations of ship and cable rendered.

When the first piece of wire was found in the cable no one had any idea but that it was there by accident; and as the cable was picked up the moment of sending the last tests from the ship to the shore, it at once occurred to us that the wire had been thrown in. It could not be at any distance through the machinery astern. But when the fi t / fully 20th was examined, a similar piece of wire at once aroused that the injury was caused by some villain on board, for the wire was driven in an article manner and pushed through the gutta percha side to side. Several attempts to pierce the cable by pressing similar pieces of wire against it with the heel utterly failed. The man declared that it was the work of an assassin. Had he been caught the world might have heard something of an attempt to administer Lynch law on board. One man could, but there was no evidence against him. When the 1st fault took place H. Despencer, second in the tank, saw one of the cablemen stoop down to tie his shoe-string. That was nothing if men were not suspicious. Besides that man did not belong to the gang then at work, but came down before his time. Then Mr. Field, who followed M. Despencer, heard a scraping of the wire as the man board it too, and called out to the man on deck.

Some people seem to think that the mischief could have been avoided if the man on deck had heard the alarm; but that is not so, as the cable could not then have been arrested in its course overboard. The only advantage gained would have been the warning to the electricians, that a wire had gone over sticking out of the cable. As it is, the nature of the third fault must be a mystery for the present. It is only surmise that it was caused by another end of wire. A combination of the same kind of fault and in its alleged perfection, for it was found that several pieces of wire were broken in the coils, and some of the wire proved to be brittle and ill-tempered. This discovery allayed the excitement caused by the suspicion of malice, but it diminished the character of the cable, as it revealed a strong suicidal tendency on its part. As yet that grave question of accident or design is undecided. Our subsequent exploit, however, tends to diminish the chances of malicious injury materially. For who will run the risk of detection, especially under the close inspection to be established in future, in order to inflict an injury which can be at once found out, and which can be hooked up from the deepest part of the Atlantic? A few words as to the grappling, which has excited so much attention. The final breakage of the cable took us all by surprise. Nothing was ready. No buoy could be slipped over. But Staff Commander Moriarty and Captain Anderson determined the exact position of the extreme part of the cable actually laid to be in lat. 51° 24′ 40″ N., long. 39° 4′ 30″ W.—to the actual seconds—and then they marked down the ground or sea gone over in the picking up till the cable broke, and traced the end to lat. 51° 25′, long. 39° 1′. On noon of the 3d, the Great Eastern having steamed and drifted in a fog 46 miles E. of the end of cable, began to grapple, caught it in 2000 fathoms, and slipped buoy No. 1 close to the line of cable and 10 miles W. of the first lift of it on August 4. Then she drifted 7 or 8 miles S.E. of the buoy in a fog till noon of 5th August, and at noon on 6th August she was 16 miles further to the eastward, enveloped in fog again, and had to steam to the westward, groping her way and looking for the buoy till she got within 3 miles of the broken end, and grappled the cable again. Then, when the second swivel broke on August 8, she slipped buoy No. 2 to mark the spot, some 10 miles W. of buoy No. 1, and left these two marks on the ocean when she was obliged to abandon the attempt. Sailors alone can appreciate the extraordinary skill displayed in the proceedings thus simply stated.

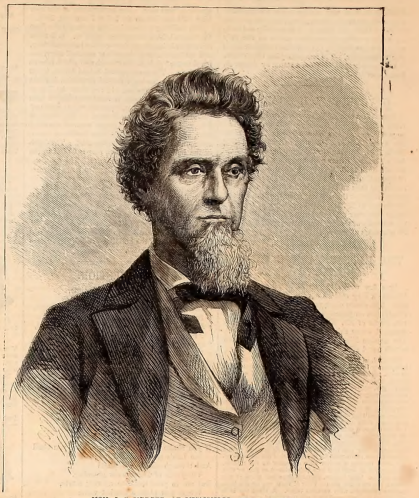
The results of the Atlantic Telegraph Expeditions of 1857, 1858, and 1865, fairly analyzed, present the following general conclusions: A submarine cable can be laid between Ireland and Newfoundland, for it was done in 1858. Messages can be sent through a cable so laid, even if it were not perfectly insulated. The difficulties in the laying of a submarine cable are much diminished by the use of one ship instead of two, and the Great Eastern affords singular facilities for the operation. If a cable be broken, it can be caught by grapnels in the deepest water of the Atlantic plateau; and therefore the danger of losing it altogether from fracture is considerably diminished. The cable can be stopped when a fault is discovered, and ten miles of it can be hauled on board from a depth of more than two miles. A fault can be cut out, and the cable respliced on board with the greatest ease. Buoys can be moored in upward of 2000 fathoms of water, so as to ride out a gale without shifting. Faults, whether designed or accidental, can be almost immediately detected and remedied. The insulation of the cable is much improved by immersion. The cable is capable of bearing ten times the weight to which it is subjected in the process of paying out in 2400 fathoms. The paying-out machinery answers perfectly; the picking-up machinery is exceedingly imperfect; and, finally, it is most desirable to have a cable so constructed that the outer covering shall, if possible, be proof against injury; for, although the cable furnished by "The Construction and Maintenance Company" was exceedingly pliable, sunk easily, and was of proper specific gravity, it appears to have been liable to accidental or intentional damage. Could the cable have been payed out without the occurrence of a fault, the Great Eastern would have accomplished her task with as much ease and certainty as the packet-boat travels from Folkestone to Boulogne. Picking-up must always be attended with a certain amount of risk; the risk indeed may be much diminished by the construction of a proper apparatus; but the principal improvement to be effected lies in obviating the necessity of transferring the end of the cable from the stern to the bow. There is no reason of a mechanical nature to prevent the paying-out apparatus being so adjusted as to have a reverse action, and, by the aid of steam, to be fitted for hauling in the cable, but if it shall be found undesirable to unite these two functions in the one machine, there is certainly no solid objection to the erection of a picking-up apparatus astern, side by side with the paying-out machinery. Nautically there is a difficulty. A large ship, particularly the Great Eastern, will not go stern to windward or keep to the sea, but Mr. Gooch has proposed the means of steering the Great Eastern stern foremost by means of a small double screw placed at the stern, under her quarter, which promised effectually to obviate any difficulty in working picking-up machinery placed in the stern of the vessel. Although the grappling of a cable at the bottom of the ocean was a very great feat, it may be at once admitted no one ever contemplated the possibility of effecting it. What has yet to be proved after all is, whether the cable can be taken up from the bottom to the surface and secured on board the vessel?



It may be observed that the cable only weighs fourteen hundred weight per mile in the water, and that it is made to bear the strain of seven miles of its own weight; but we have already seen that such calculations are not to be relied upon; swivel, bolts, and hawsers gave way at strains far inferior to the estimated breaking-point. In grappling for the cable the point to be aimed at is one mile or so from the broken end; because if the grapnel catches there, the loose end as it comes up will hang perpendicularly for a certain distance from the grapnel with a line of cable hooked at the other side, and will, in all probability, become entwined with it as the wire rope revolves in the water while it is being pulled up to the bow. Should the grapnel catch the cable at a point eight or ten miles from the end it may be found necessary to bear upon the cable till it breaks, in order to get the end for the purposes just mentioned.

There are no currents at the bottom of the Atlantic—all is a black void, in which it is doubtful if there is a trace of life, or light, or motion; it is asserted that star-fish, with minute and almost microscopic shell-fish in their stomachs, have been taken up from the bottom of the Atlantic; and, as there were traces of color on their bodies, it has been argued that the light must penetrate the abyss to a certain extent; but our reasoning on these points is so likely to be fallacious as our knowledge is limited, and the only positive information we have is, that the bottom where the cable lies consists of the finest ooze, and that there is no current or agitation of the waters beneath. Should the Great Eastern pick up the cable, splice it, and return to Trinity Bay with the remainder payed out, the Company would be in possession of two cables instead of one—there is not the least fear of there being a deficiency of work for both. New York has at least as much to say to London as it has to San Francisco; and between Europe and America the wants of civilization will need a dozen lines of telegraph as soon as the means of gratifying them are developed.

There is another consideration connected with the extension of submarine telegraphs of very great importance. We have seen that cables can be grappled for and caught, and even though it may not be possible to take them up, it is certain they can be destroyed. In event of war, therefore, an enemy's cruiser could not only interrupt communication between the one portion of the belligerent state and the other connected by submarine telegraph, but might cut off the communication between one continent and another, in order to annoy the enemy and interrupt his connection with neutral states. Whatever understanding may be arrived at, no one who has witnessed the operations of the Great Eastern, in her recent expedition, can doubt of the very speedy establishment of telegraphic communication between Europe and America across the Atlantic, and of its rapid development by the facilities which the monster ship so singularly possesses for work her designer and builder never intended or contemplated.

HON. J. S. YERGER, OF MISSISSIPPI.—[SEE PAGE 607.]

"FRATERNAL ASSISTANCE."

THIS picture, by the Düsseldorf artist F. BOSER, arrests the eye by virtue of its fine tone, perfect naturalness, and a certain spirit and freshness rather unusual among foreign pictures. Nothing can be more simply natural or descriptive than the expressions of these little folk. The good housewife, whose multifarious duties, in addition to superintending her little daughter's education, are indicated by the half-peeled potato, the pin-cushion and scissors, the ball of knitting-worsted, and other articles in this humble interior, to say nothing of the birch, doubtless in terrorem merely stuck behind the looking-glass—the housewife, we say, has evidently set the little girl too hard a sum. So, in the absence of mamma, there is perhaps a little innocent roguery going on. The little maiden appeals for assistance to her brother, who is, mind you, an old and profound mathematician (at least a year older than herself), and has prosecuted his studies at some seminary of learning in or near the village. This wise brother then comes and sits down on her stool, and, smiling at the notion that she should find a difficulty in it, at once kindly solves the problem; nay, more, he condescendingly explains its solution, while the little girl, listening reverentially and looking aside in deep abstraction, seems on the very point of apprehending the abstruse demonstrations of her instructor. The accompanying illustration, "A difficult Lesson," is from a statue by Signor A. BIELLA, of Milan.

GOVERNOR W. L. SHARKEY.

HON. WILLIAM L. SHARKEY, Provisional Governor of Mississippi, whose portrait we publish on page 605, has always been a strong Union man. He is a resident of Vicksburg, and entered public life in 1840, by being elected presiding Judge of the High Court of Errors and Appeals, which position he held until 1858. In 1859 he was appointed United States Consul to Havana. GOVERNOR SHARKEY'S record has been somewhat unique. He took strong grounds against the repudiation of the State debt of Mississippi in 1849. When the work of secession began Governor SHARKEY opposed both the principle and folly of that political heresy, and denounced its advocates as traitors.

THE LATEST YANKEE EXPERIMENT.

In a few weeks there will be afloat upon the Thames a very curious novelty in naval architecture. The steam cigar yacht, of which we give an illustration on page 597, is being built as the private yacht of Mr. WINANS of Baltimore, who has designed every thing connected with the vessel. The London Times gives the following description of this new-fl affair:

The hull, as the hull of a ship, looks one or the most extraordinary as it is possible to imagine. It is about 220 ft. long, perfectly round, resembling the shape of a cigar; being, however, somewhat at both ends, tapering off to a cigar, only one. The form is so at variance with all our generally received notions of manufactured vessels, that can only stare at it in mute astonishment, though there is something in its long, tapering lines so expressive of fleetness that one is almost ashamed that no one ever suggested such an idea before. In London, however, as our own there, it must be said that such a vessel could only be built by period when iron ships were not in vogue, and ship-building had reached its highest state of development. Looking at her now she appears to be little more than a gigantic iron minnow put for some vessel of the Great Eastern class, having a worker who dismember the minnow and tapered at each end to a point almost as fine as that of a needle. As before, like all the other parts of the vessel, are on a new plan. Four of them are on the locomotive principle, with vertical boilers, and the fifth is to give them draught, and they set to work at one time and fifty pounds pressure. Their size is very large, but on the boilers are built but stronger than is usual, and the pressure of steam which they could be worked up to one thousand pounds per inch if one pleased was hundred pounds per inch with safety. There are one hundred and thirty tubes in each of the four boilers, and in the fifth and smallest tube at the bow, each of these one hundred and forty feet can be made to pass through the length of boiler of per foot. If the furnaces can accomplish this, which, owing to the tube which gives out steam enough now for every two and a half pounds of coals consumed per hour, Mr. WINANS's yacht will be capable of nearly two thousand five hundred horse-power, or in the ratio of eight indicated horse-power to every ton burden of its vessel. In very fast ocean-going steamers the ratio of horse-power to tonnage is about one two and a half tons to one nominal horse-power. The advantage which the greater power possesses in this vessel is either with those which her slender form, smooth surface, and very small midship section (only one hundred feet) will give, should enable her to go at an extraordinary speed. It is said that, as regards models at sea, rolling and pitching will be reduced to a minimum, and certainly her form seems to suggest that such a result will very probably be effected. With very small masts and all her weights well under the water-line, she is not likely to roll. But if she does not pitch, but cuts through the water, as it were in a river sil," and in this case, with a very low deck no near the sea, we should fancy that it would be swept fore and aft. The extreme length of the vessel admits to two hundred and fifty-six feet, and her greatest width and depth is, of course, midships, where the engine and its sixteen feet diameter. Then, then, her length is no less than sixteen times that of her greatest width, which reveals being thought very narrow if their width is only one-seventh of their length.

THE NEW CITY HALL, BOSTON.

THE dedication of the new City Hall at Boston, of which we give an illustration on page 601, will take place on Monday, the 18th of September. It is expected that it will be fully occupied by the several departments of the city government immediately after.

The necessity for a new and larger Hall has been felt in Boston for many years, and the needs of the city have increased from time to time with the growth and population and the increase of public business. As early as 1838 the erection of a suitable building was proposed, and the necessity existed on School Street was soon after purchased, but in 1840 it was decided to alter the old Court House, and for some years that building afforded all the room required.

The subject of further accommodation was brought up with more energy in the Councils of 1850, and a ...out committee was appointed to consider the expediency of making additions to the existing buildings. No definite action, however, was had, and in succeeding years committees were appointed to consider the same subject. The question of enlarging the old City Hall, or erecting a new one in that or some other locality, was discussed by the City Councils, the newspapers, and the citizens generally, down to the year 1862, when a select committee reported in favor of erecting a new City Hall on the old site. After a warm discussion in the two branches of the City Government this recommendation was adopted, and the orders necessary for carrying it into effect were passed. The building, now nearly finished, the noble front of which gives satisfaction to all who have seen it, is built according to the plans adopted by the committee, and is the work of three eminent Boston architects, G. J. F. BRYANT and ARTHUR GILMAN, and of the latter's apprentice to the numerous memorials of skill and taste with which these gentlemen have adorned the streets of that city. The corner-stone of the new City Hall was laid on the 22d of December, 1862.

The building is erected of fine white granite from the Concord, New Hampshire, quarries. It is three full stories in height, exclusive of the basement story and exclusive also of the attic or mansard story, finished in the height of the French style which is that of the whole. The front, toward School Street, is 138 feet in length, having a central projection 51½ feet in length, and projecting 14½ feet from the line of the wings. This centre is somewhat higher than the body of the wings, occupies the whole with of the Mayor and Aldermen's room on the principal floor, and of the Common Council room on the third floor, and is finished above with a handsome dome, surmounted by a cupola and flag-staff. The depth of the building from front to rear is 95 feet in the wings, and 104 feet in the centre. The construction of brick walls surrounding the large staircase hall in the centre of the building affords opportunity for the most thorough and perfect ventilation of every department. A complete circulation of air throughout the structure can be maintained at all times through a register in the floor connected with each apartment by registers, and at the top with the main hot-air shaft from the heating apparatus. The whole cost of the building will fall slightly under the sum of $375,000.

THE QUESTION.

"ASKEST?" I have cried in battle-time,
When my sword basehilt perished:
"The earth of the Lord shall bloom sublime."
By the blood of His martyrs nourished."
"Amen!" I have said, when the walls were bewn.
And our wounds were blue and ghastly;
The flesh of a man may fail and swoon,
But a shall conquer lastly."

And "Amen!" sang I unto the hymn
That rose when our crowded banners
Streamed over the hosts whose eyes were dim,
Because of their hopeless manners!
But I swear I will not stab my dead
With a poniard-hate in giving
"Amen" to the faith that sets the longest
Its black wrong over the living!

If you shake clean hands with Truth, you shall See Life's essential meaning;
And through the spirit-world
Vineyards of Light walk gleaning.
But not in your traffic-mongering marts,
Nor in your hollow creeds,
Nor on the Christward aching of human hearts—
Hath His angel ought to tell you.

You think that your opaque eyes are one
With the Eye that reads the wave;
Yet your stare God's Cause in the face, and shun
The Truth with the look of a Nigger!"
You prate of mercy and—cotton bales—
But I think you are not minded
That Jus'ice, like Love, is in the scales,
Being blind, is color-blinded.

Can you patch a cloak for our nakedness
From shreds of your contriving?
Till you plant your feet on the naked stress
Of the looms the Gods are driving?
Behold! the winds of the Lord would tear
Your leopard's spots to tatters,
And leave us shivering, shamed, and bare
To the search of His packed thunder.

Shall we drouse our lives with a new pretense,
Or cry that blood is not blood,
That were soaked through for the old offense?
Must we learn anew what hell is?
Do we think Right and Wrong will will slip
Out of reach when we are sated?
Or that of His sorrow Mastership
One jot will be abated?

From the unsung graves where our comrades died,
In a regnant scorn of dying;
From souls that out of the dark have cried,
Through ages of fear and trying;
From the solemn heavens where all must stand;—
Calling to every spirit,
A Voice says warning across the land:
O brothers! let us hear it.

The White Pine Compound.

"It was early in the spring of 1855 that this compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a distressable cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation having for its basis the inside bark of the pine might be so compounded as to be very useful in diseases of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the case alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine from the White Pine tree, planting, and I am happy to say, successful. The result was exceedingly gratifying. The cough was allayed, the irritation of the throat relieved, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks from a bad cough, accompanied by sudden cold, and had raised some mucous with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took the compound for a number of weeks." — Extract from a letter from Dr. Wm. Brown, of Manchester, England.

Dr. Brown, Esq., Editor of the Manchester Daily Mirror, made a trial of the same medicine, in the case of a servant girl, who was cured immediately. He was so highly pleased with it that he sent a number of bottles to his friends in England, and there is now a large demand.

It placed before the public, that he finally persuaded me to try it myself, and send it abroad to those suffering. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of White Pine Compound. In two years from that time there had been wholesaled in Manchester alone one hundred dollars' worth, where it took the best of all the cough remedies in the market, and it still maintains that position. Now it is generally used in all the very worst cases, and healing in its nature, is warming to the stomach, and a great relief to the bowels, and is essentially tonic.

"As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound is unsurpassed. I was the first originator of this compound, but a person in using it for a cough was not aware of the fact that it was also a cure for the kidneys, and used it for that complaint.

The above was written up for Poland in 1860. Since then, as in Manchester, the White Pine Compound has taken the lead of all Cough remedies, as well as proprietary medicines, and is universally used in every city, village, and hamlet throughout the New England States. This remedy is so safe and pleasant to take as it is effectual.

In those cases of scanty, retarded growth (the Bald Head of Infancy), the Balsam of Mexican Sarsaparilla Shrub has been found to excite the Beard, Moustache, Whisker, and Hair to a luxuriant growth. (See Physiognomia.) The History and a small Sample of this Fluid Balsam sent casual on receipt of return postage.

THE OCEAN YACHT RACE.

THE race between the rival yachts Fleetwing and Henrietta began on the 11th instant. At a little after 3 o'clock in the morning the yachts started from the lightship off Sandy Hook and were soon out of sight. The Henrietta led the race under a slight southeast wind, while the Fleetwing was rather to the windward. At first the breeze freshened, but it subsequently died completely away. The weather throughout the voyage was very fickle, and the contest proved to be what is called a "drifting" race, and was thus deprived of much of the interest which would have belonged to it under other circumstances. Wednesday at noon the Fleetwing passed the lightship on its return an hour before the Henrietta. The former vessel was therefore declared the winner, though the voyage is by no means regarded as a decisive proof of the sailing qualities of either vessel.

The Fleetwing was docked off Hunter's Point. She has just been built, and is owned by Mr. G. A. OSGOOD, son-in-law of Commodore VANDERBILT. Her length is 106 feet, beam 24 feet, and depth of hold 10 feet, with a tonnage of about 200 tons. The Henrietta, owned by Mr. JAMES GORDON BENNETT, Jun., has less length of bottom, and her entrance is not so sharp. Her appearance is strongly suggestive of strength and endurance. She was built three years since, but has recently been improved.

THE TURNER FESTIVAL IN CINCINNATI.

THE Turnvereine, or Turner-Bund, was first established in Prussia in 1810. In 1848 the first society was formed in New York, and thence the organization spread through the country. It holds an annual meeting or congress, in which measures necessary to its maintenance and welfare are adopted. This year the convention met at Cincinnati. Delegates were present from every part of the country to the number of about 900. We print on pages 620 and 621 two engravings illustrating the festival of September 4 at Cincinnati. The amusements indulged in were those customary among Germans. Of course there was plenty of Rhine wine and lagerbier. Excursions were made to pleasant localities in the vicinity. Best of all, there was a concert in the evening at Mozart Hall. The vocal and instrumental music was of the highest order and well rendered, receiving encore throughout. The gymnastic exercises were such as can only be prevented to the public by the Turners; a patient and tireless energy is required to acquire the steadiness of nerve and limb without which the pyramids and tableaux are next to impossible. It was one of those rare treats which only occasions of this kind present, and every body was delighted with the entertainment.

The scene at Parker's Grove, which furnishes the subject of one of our illustrations, is thus described by an eye-witness:

"To say you were exactly penetrating the leafy foliage of the trees when the spot became a scene of life and activity. But with business to show they were in earnest, men in their shirt-sleeves, to denote that they meant business; women with babies in their arms, and others with more; more coming every moment, and all the bustle of camp life in every quarter. Some selected for themselves shady spots beneath the green trees; others mounted the arbitor's 'Go-devil' began to re-view and carry around their human freight; and in all quarters the emotionally increasing hunger of the mind determined to give by yourselves up to enjoyment. Of all the means devised to try the muscle or tweak the nose, or expand the chest, to operate the back, we have little or nothing to say. We know but little about them, and of our advantages in the no-fleet that it is necessary for us to begin just now for any new development of our manhood; at least, we shall not attempt it."

THE PRESIDENT'S EXPERIMENT.

WE elsewhere call attention to a remarkable speech of General JOHN A. LOGAN'S in Jacksonville, Illinois. The General says that the policy of reconstruction adopted by the Administration is an experiment, and that it is the duty of all good citizens to stand heartily by the President until it is proved a failure.

That is precisely the ground which a true Conservatism now occupies. The Democratic Convention is nerveless haste to set their own words of the last few years, vociferate their adherence to the President's policy, and sensible people in the morning press behold the hosts of Jacobins marshaling under blood-red banners to oppose it. But as the President is merely trying an experiment, it is rather premature vehemently to support or unreservedly to oppose his policy; nor is any country in a very "jealous state" when its Jacobins are the most intelligent, conservative, and substantial part of its population.

The President, acting from the necessity of the case and for the public safety, has set aside all the civil officers elected in various States under their Constitutions, and has appointed provisional Governors of his own. He has further prohibited thirteen certain classes of voters under the Constitutions of those States from exercising the right of suffrage, and has authorized a certain number to frame a new Constitution for the State Constitutions, of vote for members of a Convention. This Convention is to remodel the existing State Constitutions, and to proceed, under them, to elect State officers and representatives in Congress. The Constitutions and, by consequence, the validity of the officers elected, are to be submitted to the Government for approval. In the President's words, the Convention is "to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guaranty of the United States therefor, and the people to protection by the United States against invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence."

This is all that the President has done. This is his whole policy thus far. It is, as General LOGAN says, "an experiment." The President virtually says to certain persons in the States, "See what you can do. Suggest your plan." But he does not say that the plan will be adopted. He does not promise that the Constitution shall be approved and the electors thus under legislatures. The very object he has in view is to try the temper of the class of the population which he selects, to prove whether the local political power of the States may be safely intrusted to them. He does not assume finally to decide so vital a question. He leaves it, where it belongs, to the nation itself, to the representatives of the people.

The Democratic resolutions and the amiable chatter about opposition assume that it is not an experiment: that the President has declared the Constitution framed by the voters that he selected, and the elections held under it, to be the law without further process or approval. This is exactly what he has not done, and could have no pretense of authority for doing. If he had done it, if he had said that a certain class of persons in the States named by him should elect a convention, that that convention should frame a Constitution, that the elections should be held under the Constitution, and that thereupon the States would be recognized as having resumed all its relations in the Union, and its Representatives and Senators should be admitted to Congress, in matter of course, he, indeed, he would have laid down a policy, and the whole country would have crackled in opposition to it.

But the President is much too sagacious a man to have declared within less than two months after the surrender of LEE that a Constitution for South Carolina such as Mayor MACBETH or WADE HAMPTON might devise should be accepted by the loyal people of the United States. He said, simply, "Let us find out where we are. If Mayor MACBETH and WADE HAMPTON should happen to be wise, so much the better. There is no harm in trying. If they are not wise, we can try again."

Thus far the President is merely trying an experiment, and whether we think the principles upon which it proceeds promise success or failure, we ought loyally and patiently to await the event. So says General LOGAN; so says Maine; so says Vermont; so says California; so say we all.

THE AUTUMN ELECTIONS.

THE autumn elections in Maine, Vermont, and California show little sign of that great and overwhelming reaction which the party of which there have been so many dismal forebodings. Indeed, upon a smaller vote, the Union majority is proportionately larger than it was last year.

The reason is plain. In the utter wreck of its hopes, prophecies, and policies, the Democratic party has been engaged for this autumn, from Maine to Iowa, in coming as near to the Union party and its principles as possible, but with very various result. In Maine the effort was laudable. In Pennsylvania the old currents were too strong, and the Convention was like a congregation of dead men solemnly addressed by obsolete Bishops. In New Jersey the result was characteristic. The Copperhead gentlemen, who knew that the war had settled their position unalterably, made no acquiescence in it, said as much as they dared to show that their sympathies were still with the rebellion, and then nominated a man who was no escape—the least warlike of warriors, who immediately atoned for his error in having been for a short time a soldier by a rebuke speech, appealing to the old sympathies of the citizens for another. In Ohio VALLANDIGHAM ruled the Convention, and doomed the distracted party to an hour humiliation. In New York they made a clean breast of it. The party faced straight about, of course declaring that it always looked one way; and not only announced no future need of any such explanations, are agreeable to Union men, but actually snatched their chief candidates from the Union ranks.

This was the crowning proof offered by the most sagacious body of its opponents that the victorious party is the party of the land, and that success is to be expected only in the degree that its principles are professed.

Yet notwithstanding this amusing revelation of the fact that the Democratic party is utterly confounded and discordant, there have been those who prophesied a great Democratic reaction. In Maine, Vermont, and California, as in New York, the recantation was most complete, the event shows the Union ranks firmer than ever. The Democratic party is powerless for sober, intelligent, and industrious citizens, the humbug of "Democracy" is utterly exposed. In the counties of California the Union members of the Legislature were generally elected. In New Jersey the Union men work with a cheerful vigor and a resolution which no reverse can daunt, while the party remains that State from its long subservience to a narrow and inhuman policy. In Ohio, the Union party will gladly show again its overwhelming scorn of VALLANDIGHAM and the doctrines of the rebellion. In Pennsylvania nothing can defeat the Union party but its own intestine quarrels, which are unimportant. The result in New York the Albany ticket should be elected, instead of proving a Democratic reaction, it will establish the fact that the party of that name has no chance whatever except in the total surrender of the Democratic platform.

Meanwhile every voter will naturally ask himself what is gained by desertion. An organization which has always held those principles from conviction for an organization which has steadily derided them until the war put them beyond question? Or, granting the sincerity of the Democratic conversion, conceding that the leopard has changed his spots, why should the veterans of long and victorious campaigns be discarded for the raw recruits of yesterday? The Democratic syren may sing, but we doubt if she can persuade a single sailor to lay down to posterity as the yoke-fellow of JOHN TYLER.

THE "STEADY HABIT" OF EQUAL RIGHTS.

THE Constitution of the State of Connecticut disqualifies all colored citizens from voting. They may be intelligent, moral, and industrious. They may be taxpayers, property holders, exemplary and useful citizens. But the most exemplary, the most industrious, the most valuable of them is disfranchised. The Constitution of the State not to be the political equal of the most worthless white citizen whose death or removal would be a blessing to the State.

The Union party propose to remove this anomaly of the Constitution by an amendment. The Democratic party, which is the steady foe of intelligence and progressive civilization, opposes the amendment. There could be no fairer illustration of the tendency and true character of the two parties.

We hope any Connecticut man whose eyes may light upon this paragraph will remember that the question upon which he is to vote is the most fundamental one in the country. Do you believe the Declaration of Independence? Do you believe that men are created with equal rights, and that it is bad policy as well as immoral to deprive them of those rights arbitrarily? Connecticut is asked whether she will disown ROGER SHERMAN and OLIVER ELLSWORTH.

The Constitution of Connecticut allows any man to vote who is native or has been properly naturalized, of good moral character, and of ability to read. But it forbids all who conform to those conditions to vote, if they are colored. There is not any reason whatever for such exclusion, except a prejudice, and a prejudice which is not surprising in the steed of a great State? If the colored citizens own property are they not taxed? And does an American unblushingly own that he refuses an intelligent man who is taxed a voice in making the laws?

It is idle to say that the colored men are an ignorant, worthless class. The Constitution requires education and morality, and if the colored citizens are ignorant and worthless they can not vote. It is equally foolish to urge that women are disqualified, and why not any other class of citizens? Such an argument justifies the closest oligarchy, and denies that government justifies only the consent of the governed. The arbitrary disqualification of any class whatever menaces the peace of the whole community. The Connecticut disquality all the educated and moral men of her population who are over sixty years of age? The government which from its manifest justice is intrenched in the affections of all its people is the strongest in the world.

The Democratic party has been nowhere more consistently hostile to equal human rights, or more bitterly opposed to the defense of the Union and Government against an oligarchy, than in Connecticut. Its principles have been demolished by the nation, let the State finish the work. It is not a question of negro suffrage, it is a question of American principle. In the case of moral, intelligent, industrious citizens be arbitrarily forbidden a voice in the laws that tax and govern them? Can any Democrat vote for their steady habits that of equal rights for all her population.

THE ASSISTANT TREASURY.

THE leading financial institution in the United States is the United States Assistant Treasury at New York. Though it is only an assistant treasury, and the Treasury proper is at Washington, the transactions of the former are so vastly greater in volume than those of the latter that the chief work of the Washington office is keeping record of the business done by the New York branch. Nineteen-twentieths of the public creditors are paid here; nearly all the public loans are disposed of here; and a large part of the revenue from customs and taxes is received here; and here is paid, on the days fixed by law, the interest on $2,000,000,000 of United States securities. A business of from $3,000,000 to $10,000,000 daily is done here—done quickly, quietly, and without errors or disputes. No institution in the country is better worth inspection than the Sub-Treasury; and be it said, in simple justice, no man is more willing to have it inspected than Mr. VAN DYCK, the Sub-Treasurer.

The vaults are a sight which can not be witnessed elsewhere in this country. There are no vaults like them in comparatively empty cities as it only holds some $10,000,000. The other contains over sixty millions of dollars, one half in coin, the other half in paper. How many readers have ever seen a million dollars in paper or in gold? We remember one of the Supreme Court Judges, of equal large experience and profound wisdom, interrupting a party of talkers, who were chattering about millions of gold, with the naive question:

"How big a million dollars of gold? Would it rest on this table? Would it go under this chair? How many men would it take to carry it? What should we do with it?"

His Honor might have gratified his curiosity by a visit to the Sub-Treasury. There thirty millions of gold are counted, awaiting the negotiation of specie payments. They are put up in bags containing $5000 each, and weighing say 45 pounds. These bags are piled one upon another, upon which time the inner wall of the vault: a hundred bags fill a closet. When filled the door is closed, locked, and sealed, and the next closet is filled and sealed, specifies that in that dark and narrow hole $500,000 in gold lie hidden. Fifty or more such closets may be seen, duly closed, locked, and sealed. But in that vault, whose wealth far outshines the wildest fables of Oriental story, bags of gold lie around in every corner. You kick one as you enter. Others rest on trucks waiting sepulture in the closets. They are so plentiful, and so seemingly despised by the officers of the Sub-Treasury, that instinctively the spectator loses his respect for them, and forgets that the possession of a few such bags would realize his life-long dream of material prosperity.

These bags are the product of customs' duties. Every day, between 3 and 4 o'clock, a little hand-cart, ark-shaped, painted red, covered over, and locked, may be seen traveling up Wall Street, propelled by two stout men, and wending its way from the Custom-house to the Sub-Treasury. There are two of the men ostensibly engaged in pushing the little red cart. But a careful observer may discover two other men, likewise stout and very watchful, who lounge up the sidewalk on a parallel line. They look as if they carried revolvers. In fact, they do. When the custom-house bell rings, the little red ark sometimes contains $750,000—a prize worth the attention of robbers. But it is never attacked. When it reaches the Sub-Treasury it is unlocked, and the bags handed in. Each bag is then counted by the Sub-Treasurer's clerks. They count with both hands, and with a rapidity and accuracy truly wonderful. They seem to possess a sort of instinct, the product of long experience, which enables them to discover a false coin at a glance. Pieces which have been split open, the insides filed out, the cavity filled with iridium, the two halves soldered together, and trimmed on the edges, are so like genuine coins that the best judges are often deceived by them. They weigh precisely the same as genuine coins. They are precisely the right size. They have the ring of pure gold. Their external surface throughout is gold. Yet these counterfeits are detected at a glance by the experienced clerks of the Treasury. It used to be said of Mr. E. H. BIRDSALL, the present Cashier, that when he was a clerk he could, in emptying a $5000 bag, at the bottom of his hands into the glittering mass, pick out all the spurious coins.

There is a quantity of silver in the Sub-Treasury, in bags and kegs, but silver now has been handling millions of gold it seems a poor sort of metal. A silver closet holds $10,000; there are a dozen of them full to repletion. Within a short time considerable amounts of silver have arrived here from New Orleans—the product of duties or of the Confiscation Act. Many of the coins are rusted, and dingy, and it is shrewdly suspected that, during the dark days of rebel supremacy, these pieces slept the sleep of dust in dusty underground safe holes. One of the New Orleans banks is known to have buried its coin when Confederate shinplasters made their appearance, and the plan was doubtless adopted by many private individuals.

Of paper money the Sub-Treasury in New York holds some forty millions. Of this over eighteen millions are in fives, tens, and twenties, and are piled on a shelf in the vault. As nearly as we could calculate by the eye, there is about a cord and a half of this money. It might fill a two-horse hay-cart. When a paymaster calls with a draft, the clerks give him a trunk-full or a bushel basket. The notes are legal tenders and national bank-notes mixed indiscriminately—some old and worn, showing long years of service, others fresh and crisp. By-and-by, when Government begins to call in the legal tenders, woe betide the national banks whose circulation proves to be in this vault!

The larger notes, $100's, $500's, and $1000's, have the honor of closet room. There is a closet there which contains half-a-dozen millions. Lying on the floor of a mountain of these notes was a package which we examined. It could easily have been put in the coat pocket and carried away without inconvenience. It contained one thousand $500 legal tenders, and was therefore worth just half a million. But for the contempt for money which the Treasury one of these enormous sums is apt for the moment to inspire, one might have coveted this little package. How many ache and successful men did in the course of his hope of acquiring just such a parcel!

But, if you are going to steal, gentle reader, let us recommend coupons as the most convenient article to "convey." Seven-Thirty coupons are so small that you can easily put $50,000 worth in your waistcoat pocket, and as for $100,000 worth, a pinch of them, between finger and thumb, is a small fortune. These little bits of paper, no bigger than spotted-y's in size, are the size of bank bills in fractional currency, represent sums varying from $25 in gold to $365 in currency. As interest-day comes round they pour in from all quarters—from the far West and the lately rebellious South; from Germany and Holland; from crowned heads in Europe and from industrious washer-women in this country. To examine and sort these little bits of paper is no slight task. One of the richest men in New York is said to have employed daughters, nieces, and stout cutting off coupons for a whole afternoon and evening before interest-day; when the cutting is done the eldest daughter herself sweeps out the room to intercept waifs and estrays. Over $125,000,000 are disbursed annually at the New York Sub-Treasury in payment of such coupons.

The vaults of the Sub-Treasury may really be said to defy burglars. Not only are places there built on thirty-five feet of solid masonry, so that digging under them and working by a tunnel to the floor would be impracticable. Then, they stand in the main hall of the Treasury building, in which a watch is always kept, and into which it would require no small labor to intrude after nightfall. The vaults themselves are iron chambers, with iron floors, roofs, and walls. The latter are two feet thick, and hollow: the hollow being filled with musket-balls, which defy the burglar's drill. Four doors, of massive iron, open to entrance to the vault; each door is locked with two locks, so that eight different keys of peculiar mechanism are required to open once. Samuel, then, poor fellow! is not likely to be robbed at this office, however he may fare elsewhere.

We remember the Sub-Treasury when Mr. Cisco was first appointed its chief, in two rooms of the Assay Building—a quiet, retired establishment, in which nobody spoke above a whisper, and a few clerks leisurely counted their gold, and demurely paid the salary of the President and other public functionaries. People went there to deal with the Sub-Treasurer, a man of leisure and considerable information, and twice a year called to collect their interest. It was slow and old-fogy and a part of institution that even the small Wall Street bankers used to laugh at it.

In these days the Sub-Treasurer at New York has his grip on the throat of nearly all the bankers in the country, and we notice that none of them are disposed even to smile when the name of Mr. Van Dyck is mentioned.

GENERAL SLOCUM'S ORDER.

The order of General Slocum overruling the late action of Governor Sharkey, of Mississippi, is full of interest. The General says that Mississippi was one of the first and foremost of the rebel States and has submitted from exhaustion, and that the United States earnestly desire to restore it to its former position. The duty of keeping order devolves upon the military force, and the opposition to the laws defining the rights of freedmen is so strong in many parts of the State that the duties of the military are very delicate and difficult, but that he has endeavored to be as conciliatory as possible.

Thereupon, says General Slocum, the provisional Governor, without consultation with the United States military commander, proceeds to arm and organize a force in every county, urging "the young men of the State, who have so distinguished themselves for gallantry," to respond to his call—assuming thereby, says the General, those who have "scarcely laid down the arms with which they have been opposed to our Government." This force, he adds, would be larger than his own, and would inevitably provoke collisions with the colored troops. "It is to be hoped," says General Slocum, "that the day will soon come when the young men called upon by Governor Sharkey and the colored men now serving the United States will zealously co-operate in the preservation of order and the promotion of the interests of the State and nation." But arming of the State by the young men of the State will not hasten the day when the United States forces can be removed.

General Slocum says that the outrages are committed upon Northern men, Government couriers, and colored people. Southerners halted by the outlaws are allowed to escape upon stating their birth, and then they are told to say who stopped them; and Governor Sharkey suggests the arming of these very people as a remedy against disorder. Therefore the General orders that no such arming be allowed, and that all persons who have information of outlaws and desire to give it shall be arrested and held for trial.

Thereupon Governor Sharkey appealed to the President, who revoked the order of General Slocum, and the Albany Convention resolved vehemently to support the President, and nominated General Slocum for Secretary of State.

"SOUTHERN RIGHTS."

We are glad that a numerous delegation of gentlemen from the unorganized States lately called upon the President, and we say that many more will call. It is right and wise that they should acquaint themselves personally with his views, and by actual conversation and observation learn the spirit of loyal citizens. They will nowhere discover an unreasonable nor an unforgiving temper. They will find that all good citizens understand the difficulties of the situation. They will encounter nothing but satisfaction at the result of the war, and a very intelligent determination—by no means to trust those gentlemen share—to avoid, as far as possible, all unpleasant possibilities of future trouble.

But it is very desirable that certain misapprehensions and false traditions should be set aside at once. The late delegation from nine States was introduced to the President by Mr. M'Farland, of Virginia. The gentlemen composing it were, as we understand, lately in arms, and upon principle, against the Union and Constitution. Yet Mr. M'Farland gravely remarked that they were as earnest and faithful to the Union and Government as in the past. Now if they were honest rebels they believed in State sovereignty, and consequently could never be faithful to the Union and Constitution, in the sense of fidelity which the war has established. If they mean to be fully loyal now, we are delighted to hear it. But we certainly do not wish to hear that they profess to be still as true to the Union as before.

The same gentleman concluded his speech by saying that they were the best President intended "to maintain Southern rights in the Union." This is one of those perilous follies which, if the war has not annihilated, the war still have to be fought over again. We wish that the President had said to them—"Gentlemen, there are no Southern rights, nor Western rights, nor Eastern rights, nor Northern rights in the Union. There are only national rights whatever. As President, I know no other rights than those of the people of the United States who formed the Union. They were neither of the Southern or Northern rights; but I promise you to defend to the last the rights of every citizen in the land."

Suppose that the delegations from Indiana and Illinois which waited upon the President after his elevation in April had told him that they dreaded the return to the Union of Southern rights in the Union; and the delegations from New England had spoken a good word for Eastern rights, we trust the President would at once have made a reply similar to the one we have indicated.

The phrase "Southern Rights" is too suggestive of the cry that preceded the rebellion to be very becoming in the mouths of gentlemen who took part in it. The main interest of the country at present is the rights of the United States. If delegations from the unorganized States come to express their loyalty to those rights and their sincere desire to secure them, they will be more welcome to the country than if they come to repeat the falsehoods and follies which plunged us into war. Mr. M'Farland and his delegation should remember that their country is not "the South," nor Virginia, nor Georgia. It is the United States. Remembering that, let them act accordingly, and they will find only kind and willing listeners.

DR. DRAPER'S NEW WORK.

"Thoughts on the Future Civil Policy of America" is the title of the new work by Dr. John W. Draper, just published by Mr. Harper, and it is one of the most valuable contributions ever made to our political literature. Its main is twofold; first, to show that our future development must be determined by certain absolute scientific laws, which may be ascertained and applied; and second, to show what some of these laws are.

No service can be greater or more patriotic than proving to the American people, who have been dazzled and demoralized by the most swift material progress and prosperity, and whose constant tendency, arising from their situation and the necessities of their condition, is to superficial study and moral indifference, that there are laws as inexorable as that of sunrise which always have and will regulate their civilization. To bring the mind finally to the contemplation of the physical laws, not as superseding the force of ideas, but as determining the conditions under which their natural development is practicable. "Philosophical conceptions of the historical progress of humanity," he says, "require for their expression a material kind.....Ideas force humanity forward though Nature has prepared the path along which the course must be run." And he illustrates "the inscrutable but unerring power of ideas" in the Mohammedan conquests and the Jewish tenacity, in one of the most brilliant and fascinating chapters of his book.

Scientific study of man, the natural world, and history, has revealed to us, according to Dr. Draper, certain laws of human progress, both the physical character of the globe and the political, moral, and social development of its inhabitants. The chief motive power of civilization, as of vegetation and the origin of races, he finds ultimately in heat. He inquires into the effect of climate upon the physical and intellectual powers, and upon the locomotion or emigration and its consequences. He proceeds in this light to investigate the political forces of the world, the natural course of national development—and with a delightful copiousness of knowledge and felicity of illustration. The concise form in which he states a subject so comprehensive compels him sometimes to a provoking rapidity, which results in a fragmentary and a little incoherent method, and the book must be read carefully if the reader would not lose the thread. But it so sparkles with the most striking and interesting facts, and its scope is so captivating that whoever reads it at all will be very sure to read it thoroughly.

The student will find in this work, as in the author's "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," an occasional tendency to what seems fancifulness of theory. But in the conflict of civilization and barbarism by law. It is not impossible to indicate the necessary influence of well-ascertained laws. But it is certainly a question whether the accumulation of certain facts and the knowledge of laws are not still insufficient for bold and precise generalizations and a complete theory of civilization and philosophy of history. But such a doubt does not touch the intrinsic value of this work. The author has done a signal service to the wisest thought and best statesmanship of the country.

His scientific exposition of the character of accession, for instance, is original and impressive. Colonies secession, so to speak, is a truth of the lowest plants, of the most primitive vegetation. "They may be cut to pieces, and, as we have just seen, each portion is with a good, as perfect as the rest. Each individually and all conjointly are very low." As growth proceeds there is every where a tendency to concentration of power. "It turns from the hideous contemplation of a disorganization of the Republic, each State, and county, and town setting up for itself, and the continent swarming with the maggots bred from the dead body politic. I turn from that to a future I see in prospect—an imperial race organizing its intellect, concentrating it, and voluntarily submitting to be controlled by its reason; a race despising that low grade of life into which its enemies have sunk, unwittingly said that it has descended, and that, like certain base animals, it may be spontaneously discovered into a multitude of parts, each living as good as any of the rest, and capable of the same obscene operations again."

The beautiful paper, noble type, and neat, solid binding which the publishers have given the work, making one of the handsomest library volumes, are worthy its excellence.

NAMES AND THINGS.

If the word Democracy means any thing, it does not mean just this:

"Resolved—That the spirit of our institutions requires that the measure of a man's political rights should be neither his religious principles, his race, his color, nor any merely physical characteristic; and that it would be subversive both of the letter and spirit of our institutions to permit any portion of our population to be degraded into a subject class, taxed to support and compelled to obey a Government in which they have no voice, and over whose machinery may be directed to their destruction."

That is a resolution of the Minnesota Union Convention. Yet that is the very thing which the Democratic party most loudly opposes and vigorously denies. Upon the whole a Tory is a little meaner when he calls himself a Whig; and a Confederate is a little more contemptible when it calls itself Democracy.

QUESTION AND ANSWER.

"Editor of Harper's Weekly:

"Dear Sir,—Will you be so good as to extract from your paper that you do not think that the people of a State ought to govern it? Respectfully yours,

"A Virginia Unionist."

On the contrary, we have always steadily urged that the people are the only true source of political power, and that if any political community—like that of Georgia, for instance —has fallen by rebellion, or war, or by any circumstances whatever, into such a condition that it must be reorganized, we hold that the reorganization should be intrusted to the people of the State, and that the United States, by whose authority and for the greater security the State is to be reorganized, should decide whether the reorganization is satisfactory.

But we do not hold that a minority of the population of the State is the people, nor that a government formed by a class of the people, to the exclusion of other classes, resulting in the oligarchy, is that republican form of government which Congress is bound to secure to every State. In brief, we believe with the Bill of Rights of the State of Virginia, adopted in 1776—a very good year to date from—and since then forming a part of every Constitution of Virginia, "that all elections ought to be free, and that all men having sufficient evidence of common interest with and attachment to the community ought to have the right of suffrage, and can not be taxed or deprived of their property for public uses without their own consent or that of their representatives duly elected, nor bound by any law to which they have not in like manner assented for the public good." The Bill of Rights of almost every Southern State claims the suffrage as the natural and legal right of every freeman. Their Constitutions, indeed, insert the word white when naming the qualifications. That of Georgia, however, prescribes simply that the voter must be "a citizen and an inhabitant."

The spirit of these Bills of Rights we take to be the best American and Republican and Constitutional view of the situation. That qualifications of education may, under certain circumstances, be wisely required, we do not deny; but in such cases the requirement is to be universal, and not limited to a class. There are other circumstances in which we think education need not be required as a qualification.

This is a plain answer to a plain question; and now, will Virginia, or Georgia, or Louisiana Unionists as plainly tell us, whether he believes it to be republican or democratic or wise to give the political power of a State to a minority of the male adults, and allow them at their pleasure to deem a majority of legitimate, to invalidate their marriages, to refuse their testimony in courts, to disable them as real estate holders, to forbid them the freedom of the public highways except with passes, and to banish them all from the State? Especially is this wise, when the minority enjoy their power only by the consent of the United States which they are still sullen with the baffled effort to destroy, and who disable and disqualify the majority, or, as the case may be, an immensely numerous class of freemen, because they have been unfaltering true to the United States?

GENERAL LOGAN UPON REORGANIZATION.

General John A. Logan, the old leader of the Douglas Democracy in Illinois, and one of the most distinguished soldiers of the war, lately made a speech at Jacksonville, Illinois, reviewing the events of the last four years:

"With reference to the reconstruction policy pursued by the Government, he said that it was but an experiment, and that if there was any hope of its success he would yield a hearty support to the President. He confessed, however, that he had little confidence in the wisdom of purchasing such rebels by the wholesale. He thought it better to punish and hang the minority of rebel rapscallions. He was opposed to the restoration of the rights of citizenship to those whose hands had hardly been cleansed of the fratricidal blood of treason, and whose fingers were yet dripping with the blood of the martyrs of the Union. He would wait and see whether they brought forth fruit meet for repentance before granting them the privileges of the elective franchise."

A NEAT DEFINITION.

Miss Walleria, of Texas, who with her three children escaped from the State through unprecedentable perils, has a very clear conception of some historical facts. In a late description of her sufferings she recently remarked: "I took upon a world as a courageous Copperhead, but I took upon a Copperhead as a cowardly rebel."

GENERAL BURNSIDE AND THE QUESTION.

Thus brave soldier and honest man, who, at the opening of the war, was a Breckinridge Democrat, in a late stirring speech in Philadelphia upon the happy results of peace, said:

"I think the only thing to do now is to try to make our neighbors of the South and every one else to feel that we have no good to worry freemen on this continent the right to help rule the land. And, while we grant this, let us all remember that he who has sobbed with me in defense all those who may have the right to vote to vote on the right side."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Texas is no exciting news this week. Indian affairs claim their full share of the public attention. There have been some very direful disturbances, and many of the whites on the frontier have been murdered. Now that the war has been ended the Indians begin to resent the encroachment of the Government. Arrangements are now being made for a treaty with the Indians this year, many of whom seem to be peaceably inclined. On the 15th of September, Fort Smith, in Arkansas, the following tribes signed a treaty of permanent peace with the United States, as represented by loyal delegates, viz.: Osages, Seminoles, Creeks, Chickasaws, Cowskins, Senecas, Shawnees, Cherokees, and Quapaws.

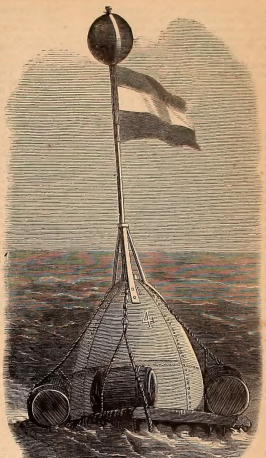
The Alabama State Convention met at Montgomery on the 12th inst. Fifty-three delegates took their seats from Governor Parsons. Benjamin Fitzpatrick, who left his seat in the United States Senate at the beginning of the rebellion, and has since been living in comparative quiet at his home, was elected President of the Convention.

On the 13th the State Convention of South Carolina assembled at Columbia. One hundred delegates being present. Governor Perry's Message strongly supports President Johnson's reconstruction policy, and declares that the contest, it is said, was offered, but received only five votes. In the Convention of Arkansas, the following resolutions were adopted by a large majority. Resolved, That this Convention recognizes the fact that the Union soldiers were the only class of Southerners who remained true to the Union, and that the Supreme Court of this State should admit to practice at the bar only such Arkansas citizens under the Federal Constitution." He says of the colored troops that their "services confirm that disproved the service and filled the public mind with the most painful apprehensions," and that at this time the Executive Department has withdrawn the black soldiers from the interior of the State and placed them in garrisons on the coast, where they can do no further mischief.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The rebuses appears to be receding eastward. At Constantinople it is estimated that the victims number 20,000, the number of deaths in a single day having reached a thousand. It is said that probably 100,000 people have left the city from panic.

The Fenian excitement in Ireland is very intense, and the order is rapidly gaining ground, though strongly opposed by the priesthood. Meetings for drill are constantly being held, and no secret is made of the object.



In Brazil, disputes with the war between Paraguay and Brazil still continues. Lopez has put himself at the head of the army. The Emperor Maximilian is still prevailing in the front. The hottest of the strife is yet to come.

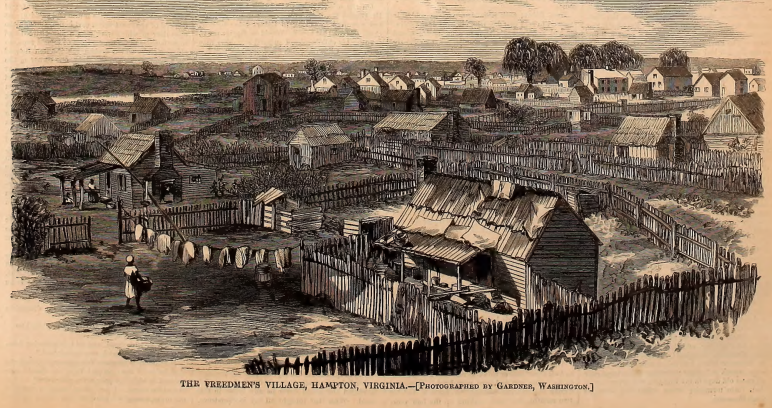
AMY SPAIN.



ONE of the martyrs of the cause which gave freedom to her race was that of a colored woman named AMY SPAIN, who was a resident of the town of Darlington, situated in a rich cotton-growing district of South Carolina. At the time a portion of the Union army occupied the town of Darlington she expressed her satisfaction by clasping her hands and exclaiming, "Bless the Lord the Yankees have come!" She could not restrain her emotions. The long night of darkness which had bound her in slavery was about to break away. It was impossible to repress the exuberance of her feelings; and although powerless to aid the advancing deliverers of her caste, or to injure her oppressors, the simple expression of satisfaction at the event sealed her doom. AMY SPAIN died in the cause of freedom. A section of SHERMAN'S cavalry occupied the town, and without doing any damage passed through. Not an insult nor an unkind word was said to any of the women of that town. The men had, with guilty consciences, fled; but on their return, with their traditional chivalry, they seized upon poor AMY, and ignominiously hung her to a sycamore-tree standing in front of the court-house, underneath which stood the block from which was monthly exhibited the slave chattels that were struck down by the auctioneer's hammer to the highest bidder.

AMY SPAIN heroically heard her sentence, and from her prison bars declared she was prepared to die. She defied her persecutors; and as she ascended the scaffold declared she was going to a place where she would receive a crown of glory. She was rudely interrupted by an oath from one of her executioners. To the eternal disgrace of Darlington her execution was acquiesced in and witnessed by most of the citizens of the town. AMY was launched into eternity, and the "chivalric Southern gentlemen" of Darlington had fully established their bravery by making war upon a defenseless African woman. She sleeps quietly, with others of her race, near the beautiful village. No memorial marks her grave, but after-ages will remember this martyr of liberty. Her persecutors will pass away and be forgotten, but AMY SPAIN'S name is now hallowed among the Africans, who, emancipated and free, dare, with the starry folds of the flag of the free floating over them, speak her name with holy reverence.

A FREEDMEN'S VILLAGE.

THE visitor to the site of what was once the little village of Hampton, Va., burned by the rebels in the winter of 1861, will see little to remind him of the place as it existed before the war. The ruins of the little brick church are the only token of the former times. Hampton is now peopled chiefly by freedmen, who number about four thousand, most of whom occupy the interesting little village known as Slabtown, of which we give a sketch on this page.

As in all instances where negroes are gathered together into communities, there are in Slabtown features of curious interest. There is a general uniformity both in the material and style of the architecture, the dwellings being built of rough barrel-staves, or slabs split out with the axe. The houses are of one story, without attic or basement. Shoe-shops and restaurants are built on the same plan, a few feet reduced. Residences of the higher class of people are marked by a blanket partition and illustrated newspaper hanging on the walls. There are two or three public squares, which would probably not compete with the Boston Common. Their stagnant ponds are lined with old boots, bottles, and other refuse. Notwithstanding this latter circumstance of the stagnant pools, the people enjoy good health. How all these people support themselves is a mystery to the visitor. An unusual proportion of the negroes are brought up to shoemaking. Some sell tobacco and beer, though it is a miracle where so many buyers come from in a community where every body seems to have for sale the same articles. What with fishing, doing odd jobs here and there for the farmers up the Peninsula, blacking boots, selling lemonade to soldiers, working in the quarter-master's department, the denizens of Slabtown manage to exist and enjoy whatever there is of comfort at Old Point, which, as a watering-place for white people, will not revive for many years.

THE ANGLO-FRENCH NAVAL FESTIVAL.

THE French and English fleets have met at Cherbourg and at Plymouth, and after a long and generous interchange of courtesy, have separated and gone to their respective destinations. The fêtes are over. We ourselves have had little interest in them except as spectators. Those of our people who have interpreted them in a some hostile to the United States have thought foolishly. Both France and England know well our power—at least they know that we can not easily be intimidated. The best nautical judges of either nation would not hesitate to pronounce our present naval situation more favorable than that of France or of England. No; this international festival has been perfectly innocent so far as we are concerned. Nor are we disposed to envy either of those nations the other's friendship.

The English fleet, under Admiral DACRES, left Portland Roads on the 18th of August, arriving at Cherbourg the next day. The fleet consisted of the Achilles, Black Prince, Defence, Prince Consort, Hector, Research—iron-clads; and the following wooden ships—the Edgar, Liverpool, Octavia, Constance, Tweed, Jason, and the Salamis, dispatch-vessel. On the 15th was the celebration of the Emperor NAPOLEON'S birthday, in which the English fleet cordially participated.

The large engraving in the middle of our paper gives an excellent view of the appearance of the British fleet as it lay in the harbor of Cherbourg at night o'clock on the morning of the 16th, when a general salute was fired by all the vessels of the English ships, together with the forts and batteries of Cherbourg. An English correspondent thus describes the spectacle:

"The weather on the 15th was rainy and unpleasant; but as night o'clock drew near all the quays and wharves west of the town began the line of spectators, crowded with thousands, who came out, in spite of the rain, to see the fleets exchange salutes. The night was very misty. With the first note of eight bells the Edgar and Magenta fired almost simultaneously, and in a second afterward all the vessels were broadsided, both French forts and detached rock batteries, not excepting the polacre-ketch and the mortar-boat, with a sharp, rattling crash, which, seeming to echo itself, recalled gradually into a din which really startled one. But that the ships were moving in motion, it would have seemed like a naval battle; the ships lying broadside to broadside kept blazing at each other till all were lost in the smoke; from which, even amidst the noise of the guns, could be heard the shrill boatswain's pipes of the various vessels piping all hands. What these directions were was soon seen; for, as the firing ceased and the smoke of smoke was cast slowly leeward, each ship emerged from its cloud "dressed" as if by magic from stem to stern with one blaze of colored lights, and the English ships with their top-gallant yards crossed. All the French ships dressed athwart-ships from the yards, while the flagship, as usual, hoisted their colors fore and aft over the mast-heads and down astern. The effect of both was very pretty, though the strong sea and wind, being violently dead ahead, showed the French mode off to the greatest advantage. All the English vessels carried the French flag at the main, and, when the salute was over, the Lords of the Admiralty paid the high compliment of lowering their own flag from the Bachantes and hoisting that of France in its place."

In the evening there was a singularly brilliant illumination.

On the evening of August 17 the festivities at Cherbourg ended with a ball at the Hôtel de Ville. About 1200 persons were present.

On the 25th the British fleet returned to Portsmouth, following on the 20th by the French squadron. This latter consisted of the Emperor's yacht Reine Hortense, the Solferino, the Magenta, the Normandie, the Friedland, the Invincible, the Ville de Paris, the Provence, the Heroine, the Caton, the Ariel, and the Flore. The French fleet was fêted at Portsmouth as the English had been at Cherbourg.

TWO WHO WAIT.

"There's rosemary—that's for remembrance."

I LOVED Robert as I never could love again. I was an orphan, and friendless. Being quick with my needle, I came to Boston to obtain work—work there. Somehow chance favored me—no, I don't mean that. I mean that God who promised to be a father to the fatherless was good to me. I found a comfortable boarding-place, and, by means of my landlady's influence, I got employment. I sewed by the day to finish off dresses, sewing with dress-makers sometimes, and more often after they had got through and gone away. Mrs. Grant boarded in the same house with me, and he liked me from the first.

How proud was of his liking, the handsome, manly fellow! His own clerk in a store, and he got through every night at six o'clock; and often, if he could not leave where I was, he would come and walk home with me. This was before we were engaged. Afterward, of course, almost every night, as a regular thing. But I never shall forget how it used to be during those first months before he had asked me to marry him. I never quite knew whether he would come or not, so it was something pleasant to think and wonder about as I sat over my work. Then, when I saw that he was really waiting, how shy I used to be, and how demurely I used to walk along with my eyes down until he joined me, and then look up at him as if I were altogether surprised! It was an innocent little deception, and I believed no one. You don't know why I speak of it, only sometimes I like to go over all those old days in my thought, and every one of their little memories seems bright and sweet as fresh blossoms.

I had known Robert six months, when one night, instead of going home at once, as usual, he asked me to go out to Mount Auburn with him. The days were at their longest; it was only half past six, and there would be plenty of time for a ramble among those flowery paths before they would shut the gates and leave the dead people to their still night-schlumber. I was glad enough to go any where with him; and it was very pleasant to get out of town, and spend the long June twilight among country sights and sounds. So we went off at once.

How beautiful it was, walking about in those lovely grounds, with the day just drawing to its close. There were the trees—some of them flowers growing up joyously, and shaking odor out of their crimson and purple cups upon the still air, emblems of glad, grateful life. Robert plucked me, too, here from their stems, and laid upon the graves, offerings of love and of memory, to give forth with the sad sweetness of their spring breath, and then fade, emblems these of death and of woe.

It was there, among the flowers and the graves, that Robert told me how dearly he had grown to love me, and asked me to belong to him forever. Yes, I remember he said that—forever to him forever. That meant, did it not, through life and through death? Surely it bound me—when I had promised him—for all time, and all eternity as well. I was strange, but in the midst of my great, deep joy a thought came over me—what if this wife-pledging among the graves was a mockery before God? should be for death and not for life? But I tried to banish the foreboding. It was a silly superstition, naturally, so I would not let myself utter the haunting thought to Robert.

When the time came for the gates to be shut we went out arm in arm, we two who belonged to each other for evermore. We walked about for a while under the trees there in the moonlight, and then went back to town, and the moon poured down on us a flood of silver light. It seemed to us that we had never seen the moon before, and that we were under new heavens and upon a new earth.

When we got home we told our landlady—good Mrs. Coleman—that we had been so kind to me—of our betrothal. Robert said frankness was best in such matters, and in all cases. We were to be married just yet. His salary was small, and he must save enough to begin housekeeping in a quiet way. To do more than this he would not allow, to be with me as much as possible, and so it was well our relation should be understood, and then there would be no need of secrecy.

That New-Year, however, the first he worked for raised his salary, so that he saved the money we needed sooner than he had hoped, and we were married the next summer, a year after our betrothal. Then Robert took me to his home. It was a large room—a chamber, a kitchen, and a little parlor. We thought of a spare bedroom at first, but I had no friends who could visit us, and we were so, indeed, had Robert; so we saved that expense. What a bright, cheery home we had! How much pride and pleasure we took in it! How we used to admire and adornment! We thought we were just as happy as we could be: but when another year went by, and with the first anniversary of our wedding day, at us with her shy sweet eyes, full of strange baby wisdom, we found that we could be happier still. I wanted to say that Robert's love increased because she came when the roses came, and Robert wanted to call her Rosemary, after the flower's name; so we compromised and called her Rosemary.

I think you never saw just such a baby—never, indeed, could you, for she was the child of your own. She was such a round, rosy, fat, dimpled, loving, sunny, bird-like little creature, with wise, still ways that kept us in constant delight. We the world looked to her, and what she was thinking about. She was a perpetual novelty and entertainment to us. We were very proud of her considerable future, watching her growth, playing with her, fondling her. And so ten months went by, and then, gayly, until it was March after little Rosemary came.

Then Robert took a sudden, violent cold. It came on to rain one day while he was at the store. He had to go out to attend to some business, and during the course of unavoidable delay, standing without them, and came home to me at night so hoarse he could scarcely speak. It was his last day's work.

Let me hurry over those few terrible weeks of suffering and suspense through which I nursed him. He died the first of April. Rosemary was a year old from us little Rosemary had learned to say "papa." She said it to us just before Robert died, and we can forget the way his face kindled with a lifelike brightness which made me almost hope to hold him back in his flight from me. Rosemary clung about his arms, those thin, weak arms, and I laid the child in them.

"God bless you," he said, "my darling, my little darling! God bless you, and keep you from all evil!"

Then he began to cough, and I took her away, and died her into her tiny rocking-chair, where she had learned to sit patiently hour after hour, never troubling any one. When the coughing-spell was over he closed his eyes, and I heard him say in a faint whisper:

"Their angels do always behold the face of the Father;" and I knew he was thinking of his little one, and what her life would be when he was gone.

Just at the last he turned his eyes to me, and said in weak, faint tones:

"You have been my true wife, Mary. You have walked with me down to the very brink of the river. You must go back alone."

With these words he made a sign for me to kiss him, and bending down I pressed my lips to his, that even then quivered beneath my touch, and faintly returned my pressure. When I lifted up my head he was dead.

I had been about a month before I had courage to look about me, or think at all what I was going to do. The fire had been very kind. They contributed liberally to pay the funeral, and for two months afterward, making up the half year. Of course that was all I could have expected of them, and more—I must take care of myself and my little girl. Robert had left a little money, but that I did not mean to touch. I felt that it ought to remain as a provision against any time of pecuniar need, or for Rosemary if I should die. So I went round among my old customers and procured the promise of as much work as I could do to take home, for it was of course out of the question to leave my child and go out all day, as I used to do. When I sat down to sew, all were to me, and how sorry for me, I began to realize how many good hearts there are in the world.

For two years I worked nicely. To be sure it left an awful void in my life to take Robert out of it, but I remembered that I had promised to believe in God's mercy, and I felt that I was only waiting. My little one was a great comfort. She looked at me with her dear blue eyes, with a curious serious likeness in her words and ways to his which sometimes gladdened and sometimes saddened my heart.

Her comforts were very frail. She had been a fat, dimpled baby enough; but after she could run alone she grew slender, and her skin was almost transparent. She was never really ill until the summer two years after her father died. Then she became so delicate that she required a great deal of care. I say delicate, at first that it was because she was cutting a long-delayed double tooth, but soon I began to think there was graver cause for alarm. A cut for a doctor, a kind, fatherly man—Dr. Grant his name was—and he told me that he feared a spinal disease. The disease was of such a nature that she would require the closest care and attention to save her life. And even then— But he had not finished his sentence. Looking into my face I think he could not nerve himself to do so.

I used to hold her in my arms more than half the time for nights after that. Of course I could do no sewing, and the money Robert had left dwindled away. I began to wonder how I could keep what I was to do. Dr. Grant came and seemed to have something in particular to say. He had a talk with me, and I found that he knew of a rich family who had a child of about Rosemary's age, and where my lot should be to be cased of all such burdens as he could bear in my stead.

While he talked I was terribly tempted. The home he offered me was a promise such rest, such relief from care, and the torturing anxiety how to do my duty to my child and get my daily bread at the same time. I was tempted, but I resisted it all. I knew she needed so much that I could not give her. Perhaps it would save her life. Had I a right to refuse? And yet I knew I did not have it, Dr. Grant. I dared not answer him on any momentary impulse. So I told him if he would go and see me again, he thought I would see him again on the morrow. He held my hand a moment with grave tenderness.

"Remember, Mrs. Eden," he said, "that whatever way you may decide I shall not be the less your friend. If you will let me be a friend to come to my home and let me care for you I shall be happy indeed, and will do my best to make you so."

All that night, until the gray dawn lightened the heavens, I sat holding my little one in my arms and thinking. I went over and over all the advantages of the case—most of all what it would do for Rosemary to be in a home of plenty, surrounded with every appliance of ease and luxury; constantly watched, moreover, by a kind and skillful physician, whose interest in her, I knew, would be only second to mine. All this on one side.

On the other the stern fact that I did not love Dr. Grant—that I never present memory of him had promised to belong to Robert Eden forever. Could I break that vow? Would he forgive me if, even for his child's sake, I offered my other love to press the lips on which his dying kiss still lingered?

Even I thought farther. Filled as my heart was with fond memories of the dead, thrilling to that remembered love as the only world to the centre of existence of my living man's passion, should I not be wronging Dr. Grant's noble nature unpardonably if I gave to him only the cold shell he hoped to have—offered a deity which was only lip-deep? At last, just in the gray dawning, I made up my mind that I would let Rosemary go. I made up my mind that all to God, even Rosemary. I would not sin against my womanhood by purchasing comforts for her at the price of my love. I would be true to the plighted to her father. I knew that I had decided rightly by the great peace which flowed into my heart.

I lay down, at last, with my little girl still in my arms, and I seemed to feel—was it all fancy?—the outstretched hand of Heaven, to bear a well-known, well-loved voice murmur,

"Through life and through death! My beloved, thou hast been faithful."

Then I slept the long, deep sleep of exhaustion; and when I awoke Rosemary was watching me with her great blue eyes, and it was high noon-time for Dr. Grant to come.

I showed him honestly all my heart, and, when he understood that I never could have given him such love as he craved, he told me I had done right—that any other course he could have been injustice to myself, to him, and to the dead. But if I could not be his wife, he said, I must be to him as his sister—I must suffer him to provide for all my necessities, for he should not let me sew any more until—he stopped an instant, and then finished his sentence—until the little girl is strong.

But, in spite of his attempt to spare my feelings, it struck in one moment to my heart that he felt convinced she would die, and for me, left in the world. With that thought all my independence, all my sensitive pride, was silenced. I felt as willing to accept the help he offered as I was grateful for his kindness. I could not give one hour more of my darling's short life to any thing but her care, if I knew. He wanted to assist me—was alike willing and able. I took his generous hand and raised it to my lips.

"May God reward you!" I said. "I know I never can, and yet I accept your offering as frankly as it is made."

So all the rest of that summer I tended my poor, little fading flower, and Dr. Grant watched our wants like a brother. What days those were! Those long, long days, in which I held her from morning till night, clasped in arms which never thought of weariness or burden! A strange, unnatural wisdom seemed to develop in the little three-year's child who was living her short life so fast. I had long given him her secret of her fears, however, the home where her father waited—where she, too, would be waiting for me very soon.

At last the end came. She had been growing more like an angel every day, and at length the angels called her home. Her little arms clasped me for the last time—her lips pressed mine—and her baby voice bade me good-by. My darling, oh my darling!

She has slept these two years beside her father. I am looking forward always through all the tumult of life to the day when I too can go home. I bear life's burden patiently—I try to do my duty in the station to which it has pleased God to call me, but I am waiting for the time when my Master waits, and with him my little Rosemary—not sure, I think, that heaven is heaven until I join them there.

THE MYSTERIOUS SKETCH.

NEARLY opposite the church of St. Sebald, in Nuremberg, stands an ancient inn, narrow and lofty, with a projecting gable, small dormer windows, and the roof surmounted by a plaster image of the Virgin. Many years ago, when beginning to be old as a young artist, I took up my abode in this quaint hostelry. I had come to Nuremberg in order to study the works of the old masters—but, my funds running short, I was obliged to take portraits—and such portraits! Stout old ladies, each with her cat in her lap; stout burgomasters, wrapped and buttoned—all plentifully and impartially illuminated with ochre and vermilion.

But this resource began to fail; and mine host, who at first had been all civility, began to importune me in a somewhat insolent manner for the payment of my bill. One evening, as I was passing up stairs to my attic, Master Rapp called after me:

"Halle! yonngster, have you any thing to-day?" Your bill now amounts to one hundred and sixty florins, ten kreutzers. Pray, when am I likely to see the color of my money?"

I muttered some sort of indistinct reply, and hastening to my room locked the door, and threw myself, dressed as I was, on my bed. The gathering miserable position in my mind, and the genial feeling for art, all the high aspirations after excellence which had hitherto buoyed me up, seemed to forsake me, and a sordid, hungry craving for money took their place. At length my eyes closed on these busy thoughts confused, and I slept profoundly for some hours. About two o'clock I awoke in a hungry sort of excitement. Having lighted my lamp, I seized a piece of paper and a crayon, and drew a rapid sketch, in the Dutch style, feeling all the time as if the subject was not mine, but as if each stroke was suggested by some one who merely used my hand and pencil as unconscious and unresisting instruments. The sketch thus traced represented a grocery court, surrounded by lofty but crumbling walls, which were pierced by loop-hole looks at the height of seven or eight feet from the ground. On the left was a trellis of iron, through the bars of which, as on other lattices, suspended by strong pulleys from the roof of a shed. Streams of blood flowed across the pavement, and lost in a torrent of the kennel and rubbish. At one end of the court was a cart-house, through the open door of which were seen a pile of wood and some bottles of straw. Pieces of ragged meat, an old hen-coop, and a broken rabbit-hutch littered the fore-ground. On the right, one corner of the thatch remaining blank, I hesitated what to put there; something seemed to move, to hover around it. Suddenly a foot turned up and detached from the ground appeared to my mind's-eye. Following the inspiration I sketched on rapidly, and beneath the crayon appeared a leg jerked up, then a floating garment, at length the entire figure of an old woman, pale, emaciated, with disheveled hair, thrown down across the low parapet of a well, and struggling against a hand which clutched her throat.

I was drawing the last touches to the murderer's left hand. I shuddered as I looked at the woman's face, contracted by terror, while both her hands seemed to push away the arm of her assailant.

But his face, I saw it not; it was hidden from me as by some veiling shadow—I could not finish the sketch.

"I am fatigued," I said, passing my hand over my damp forehead; "to-morrow I will finish the design; there remains but that one figure to put in."

Hardly undressing I went to bed, and before five minutes had elapsed I was sunk in a profound slumber. When I awoke it was broad daylight. I started up, and was proceeding to arrange in memory my task when I heard two knocks at the door.

"Come in!"

The door opened, and a tall old man, dressed in black, stood at the threshold.

"Herr Heinrich Kapff, the painter?" said he.

"At your service, Sir."

He bowed his head, and said, introducing himself: "Baron Frederick von Sprechdahl."

That the name of Baron von Sprechdahl, who was also Judge of the Criminal Tribunal, should consent to visit my poor attic, was indeed an unlooked-for event. I cast an embarrassed glance at the mean, scanty furniture, the low ceiling, and the worm-eaten flooring; but my visitor seemed to pay no attention to these details. Seating himself near my small table: "Herr Kapff," he said, "I come—"

At that moment his eyes fell on the unfinished sketch, and he gazed at it fixedly for several moments.

"Are you the author of this drawing?" he asked, looking at me with the same attention which he had bestowed on my work.

"I am, Sir."

"What is its price?"

"I do not sell my sketches; it it merely a design for a painting."

"Ah!" said he, taking up the paper delicately with the tips of his long sallow fingers; and with the aid of his eye-glass he studied the sketch closely.

"And the dimensions of the painting, Herr Kapff?" said he at last, without looking up.

"Four feet by three."

"Its price?"

"Fifty ducats."

My visitor laid the sketch on the table, and drew from his pocket a long, well-filled purse of green silk.

"Fifty ducats," he repeated; "there they are."

And throwing down the purse on baron salsted me, and was gone before I had sufficiently recovered from my amazement to utter a word of thanks. I heard his walking-stick strike on each stair as he descended, and I ran down quickly after him. But when I reached the door of the inn he was already gone; I looked up and down the street, but he was not to be seen.

"Well, this is odd enough," I muttered; and having enumerated the five flights of stairs up and down at the table, brightened by the unwonted gleam of gold, and resolved to finish the sketch without delay: a few more touches, and the crayons were all that was required. But these few touches, try as I would, could not agree. I had lost the glow to the design; the mysterious personage would not come out of the limbo of my brain. It was of no use to force and efface, and draw and paint at each touch; the creature of my pencil was as discordant with his surroundings as one of Raphael's figures would be in a village ale-house by Teniers. I threw down my crayon in despair, and the perspiration stood in large drops on my forehead.

Confused voices, and heavy steps mounting the stairs: my door was violently shaken.

"In the name of the law, open!"

Trembling, though I scarce knew why, I obeyed. Two muscular hands instantly grasped my collar, and a fat little man in green uniform, puffing and strongly of beer, came close to me, and said: "Heinrich Kapff, I arrest you."

"For what crime?" I inquired, as I recognized the chief of police.

"Come along," he cried, roughly, and made a sign to one of his men to hand me my coat.

Resistance of course was useless. I was effectually secured, and conveyed down stairs by some of the party while the others remained to search and sweep every corner, prodding the furniture, and turning over on the floor my poor wardrobe and other scanty possessions. My captors thrust me into a covered carriage, and two of them entered after me, and took their places one at each side.

"What have I done?" I inquired again.

"Hans," said one of them to the other, with a sour smile, "he asks what he has done!"

Soon a dark shadow swelled on it, as the carriage rolled under the gloomy archway which leads to the Rapel Haus, or city prison. The door of the dingy wooden cap on his head, and a short pipe between his lips, received me from my conductors, and having silently introduced me into a cell, retired and barred the door, and left me to my reflections.

The room was small, but tolerably clean, and the walls being newly whitewashed, presented no inscription or drawings, save a rude sketch of a gallet, probably executed by my predecessor. It was lighted by a small window, nine or ten feet from the ground, and the furniture consisted of a bundle of straw and a bucket.

I seated myself on the straw, and remained, I know not how long, plunged in a gloomy reverie. Very soon the door grated on its hinges; my jailer appeared, desired me to follow him.

I was conducted into a gloomy sort of judgment-hall, at the upper end of which were seated two judges, one of them being my friend Herr Spreckdahl. A clerk, employed in tickling his ear with the feather of his pen, sat before a table.

Von Spreckdahl, raising his voice, addressed me as "Heinrich Kapff, how did you become possessed of this drawing?"

He showed me the nocturnal sketch; I examined it, and replied: "It was done by me."

There was a silence, and the clerk wrote down my reply.

I thought within myself: "What is the meaning of this? What connection can the sketch have with my pushing Rapp down stairs?"

"It was done by you," repeated Von Spreckdahl. "What is the subject of it?"

"It was: fancy sketch."

"You have not copied the details from any painting or engraving?"

"No, Sir; I invented them all."

"Prisoner," said the judge in a severe tone, "I advise you to reflect. Do not lie."

I reddened with anger, and said, emphatically, "I have spoken the truth."

"Write, clerk," said Von Spreckdahl.

"And this woman," continued he, "who is being sanguinated at the edge of a well, have you imagined her figure also?"

"Certainly."

"You never saw her?"

"Never."

With an indignant gesture Von Spreckdahl rose from his chair, then resuming his seat, he appeared to consult in a low tone with his colleague

"What can it be all about? What have I done?" murmured I to myself.

Addressing my guards, Von Spreckdahl said: "Conduct the prisoner to the carriage.—We are going to the Metzger Strasse.—Heinrich Kapff, he continued, "you are pursuing a deplorable path. Consider that if the justice of man is inflexible, the mercy of God may yet be obtained by a full confession of your crime."

I could not reply; I felt as if under the influence of some frightful dream, and prepared to follow my guards in silence.

Two policemen and I entered the carriage, which rolled along through several streets. One of my guards took out his snuff-box, and offered a pinch to his companion. Mechanically I also extended my finger and thumb towards the box, but its owner drew it back with a gesture of aversion, and quickly replaced it in his pocket.

I felt the hot tingling blood mount to my forehead, but before I could speak the carriage stopped. Some of the guards sprang out, and on the other side, fettered as I was, by the collar, until, seeing his comrade ready to receive me, he thrust me rudely out.

All these precautions to secure my person argued no good, but just then I was given no time for reflection. My guards hurried me along a narrow, filthy alley, bounded by high walls, and through which trickled a little stream of some thick dark liquid, arrived at the end, they opened a door, and pushed me before them into a square court. During our progress a sudden horror had taken possession of me, not arising from the uncertainty and mystery of my position, but rather like the effect of nightmare. I seemed to be walking in a frightful dream, seeing and acting without my own volition, and under a haunting conviction of the unreality of all the objects around. But this horror became very tangible and real when I looked around the place where I now found myself. There was the very identical scene which I had seen in the night before—the walls furnished with hooks, the broken hammock, the pulley, the bucket. A single detail, not even the most trifling, was wanting!

Beside the well stood the judges, Von Spreckdahl and Von Sack, and near them, on a low stool by the old woman, her long gray hair dishevelled, her face livid, her eyes starting from her head, and her lips parted in convulsive breaths between her clenched teeth. It was a horrid spectacle.

"Prisoner!" said Von Spreckdahl in a solemn voice, "have you anything to say?"

I made no answer.

"Do you acknowledge that you threw this woman, Theresa Becker, into this well after having strangled her and taken possession of her money?"

"I have never seen this woman in my life, and I never saw her until now. May God help me!"

"It is enough," said he, in a dry tone; and then, without shifting either number word, he and his colleague took their departure.

My guards conducted me back to the Rapel Haus, and left me once more to my fate. I felt a profound stupor, and when but half aroused from it, my conscience awoke to a sort of morbid activity, and I began to ask myself if I had not really assassinated the old woman!

Day dawned, and I was lighted up my gloomy prison. The window looked on the street. It was a market-day, and I heard the rolling of the carts laden with fruit and vegetables, the loud dispute, the cackling of the live poultry, and the animated discourse of the butter-women. As the morning advanced, the noise in the street became louder, and the bustle and movement of life around me seemed to restore courage to my heart. I felt an irresistible desire to live, to see the sun, to walk abroad, and to look once more on the faces of my fellow-men.

My predecessors in the cell, animated, no doubt, by a like desire, had scratched holes in the wall to facilitate their mounting to the window. I climbed to it, and holding the bars, managed to seat myself on the narrow ledge. Once there, I gazed entranced on the crowd, the life, the movement; tears flowed from my cheeks; I drank in the sunlight of life as he air, simply to breathe, and move, and feel the sun. "Ah!" I exclaimed, "to live—only to live! Let them sentence me to what they will; let them attach a weight to my leg. What does it matter, provided only that I live!"

The quaint old market on which I looked offered a gay and animated spectacle. The peasant-women in their Bavarian costumes were seated behind their baskets of eggs, fruit, vegetables, and fluffy cages filled with poultry; butchers with naked arms were cutting meat on their blocks; peasants, with their large-brimmed felt hats set far back on their heads, leaned on their stout holly-sticks, and smoked long pipes. The animated and varied scene captivated my attention, and, in spite of my distracted my thoughts from my sad situation. As I continued to gaze on the busy crowd, I perceived by, his back bent under the weight of an enormous quarter of beef which he bore on his shoulders. His arms were bare, his sleeves rolled up, his head bent down in front. His hair falling down in a mass over concealed his face, and yet at the first glance I shuddered. "It is he!" I exclaimed, inwardly.

All my blood flew back to my heart. I lapsed from the window-bars in a profuse, shivering, my teeth chattering, while the rebellious blood flowed back again, and mounted hotly to my cheeks and forehead.

"It is he! He is there—here—and I—I must die to expiate his crime! O my God, help me! What am I to do?"

A sudden idea, an inspiration, as I believe, from heaven darted through my mind. I put my hand into my coat-pocket, and found my case of crayons. Rushing to the clean whitewashed wall, I sketched the scene of the murder with marvelous force and rapidity. No more uncertainty, no more wavering attempts. I knew the man who grasped the luckless woman's throat; I saw him as if he were sitting to me for his portrait. At ten o'clock the jailer entered my cell.

"What is this?" he said, looking with surprise at my sketch.

"Go, ask my judges to come hither," I cried, still pursuing my work with frantic ardor.

"They await you in the Hall of Judgment," replied he.

"Tell them to come; I have a disclosure to make," said I, as I put the finishing touch to the murderer's figure. It looked as if it lived and breathed; foreshortened on the wall, the features stood out with wonderful force and reality.

The jailer went out, and in a few minutes the two judges entered. With my hand extended, and trembling in every limb, I said to them: "Behold the assassin!"

Von Spreckdahl carefully and quietly examined the sketch. "His name?" he inquired.

"I know it not," I replied; "but at this moment he is in the act of setting up meat at the third stall on the left as you enter from the Trabanten Strasse."

"What do you advise?" said my judge to his colleague.

"That we should instantly send for the man," replied he, in a grave tone.

Stepping out into the corridor, he gave his orders to the policemen stationed there. During their absence the two judges remained standing, contemplating the sketch. Suffering from strong reaction, I sank on the ground, and buried my head between my knees.

Soon steps resounded from afar along the vaulted passages. Those who have not waked from the hour of deliverance, and counted the minutes, then as long as centuries—those who have not felt the poignant emotions of suspense, terror, hope, and doubt—they can not conceive the sharp agony of that moment. I could have distinguished the foot-steps of the murderer, marching between his guards, from a thousand others. They approached; the village functionaries appeared moved. I raised my head, and my heart felt as though it were grasped by an iron hand. My eyes were fixed on the closed door. It opened—the man entered. His cheeks were red and swollen; his large jaws were contracted, causing the muscles to stand out even up to his ears; and his coarse, matted, tawny-colored eyes sparkled beneath a pair of thick reddish eyebrows.

He assisted, and silently showed him the sketch. Then this powerful, sanguine-complexioned man turned pale—pale as death. Uttering a roar which startled me, he opened his immense arms, and bounding backward succeeded in overthrowing two of his guards. There was a terrific struggle in the corridor; we could hear the panting respiration of the butcher, deep imprecations, broken words, and the stamping and shuffling of many feet. At length I distinguished, in his hand sank on his breast, his eyes bloodshot, his limbs firmly fettered. Again he looked fixedly on the drawing, and with a sword, he reflect, and muttered, as if to himself, "Who, then, could have seen me—at midnight?"

I was saved.

A LOCK OF HAIR.

A WOOD-NYMPH sat by a mossy tree
One bright May-day when buds were springing;
Her tresses were dark as night could be,
But her heart was light, and she was singing
A sunny song in the forest there:
Was it she who gave me this lock of hair?

One midsummer noon, by the sighing sea,
Along the pebbly shore I strolled,
And one was there who walked with me,
Whose eyes were azure, whose hair was gold:
Was it then I took a chestnut curl?

The winter winds were wild and drear,
My soul was sick, and I sighed for rest,
And the wayward one is to me most dear
Kissed me, and soothed me upon her breast:
This tress is as white as a flake of snow,
And it came from my beautiful mother's brow.

CHAPTER I.

HIGH ART.

AS SAXON'S cab turned in at the gates of the South Western Railway Station, Mr. William Trefalden, who happened to be in the neighborhood of a very similar Hansom, was driving rapidly down the Waterloo Road. The two vehicles with their unsuspecting occupants had been almost side by side on Waterloo Bridge, and, by one of those curious coincidences which happen still oftener in real life than in fiction, the one cousin was going down into Surrey as the honored guest of Lady Castletowers, while the other was rattling over to Camberwell in search of her ladyship's disinherited half-sister.

"Six, Falconell Terrace."

Mr. Trefalden took the card from his pocket-book, and read the address over once or twice. It was the address that Miss Rivière had given to Saxon, and which Saxon had intrusted to the lawyer's keeping a couple of hours before. Mr. Trefalden was a hungry man of business, and was showing himself to be, in the present instance, better than his word. He had promised to act for his young cousin in this matter; but he had not promised to set about the task that same afternoon. Yet here he was with his face already turned southward, and Miss Rivière's address in his hand.

The fact was that Mr. Trefalden took more interest in every piece of family history than he had chosen to express, and was bent on learning all that might be known about the Rivière branch, out an hour's unnecessary delay. No man better appreciated the value of a family secret. There might, it is true, be nothing very precious in this particular specimen; but then one could never tell what might or might not be useful hereafter. At all events Mr. Trefalden was not slow to see his way to possible advantages; and though he had asked time for consideration of what it might be best to do, he had half a dozen schemes outlined in his mind before Saxon left the office. Mr. Trefalden's plans seldom needed much elaboration. They sprung from his fertile brain like Minerva from the head of Zeus, armed at all points, and ready for the field.

Leaning back thoughtfully, then, with folded arms and a cigar in his mouth, Mr. Trefalden drove past the Obelisk and the Egyptian Hall of Castle, and plunged into the very heart of that dreary suburban district which might with much propriety be called by the general name of Transpontis. Then, dismissing his cab at a convenient point, he proceeded in search of Brudenell Terrace on foot.

Transpontis is a district beset with difficulties to the inconsequent explorer. There dust, dissent, and dullness reign supreme. The air is pervaded by a faint odor of universal brickfield. The early evening hour is audible as inexorable hours of the day. Files of shabby-genteel tenements, and dismal slips of parched front-gardens, follow and resemble each other with a bewildering monotony that extends for long miles in every direction, and is only interrupted here and there by a gorgeous gin-palace, or a depressing patch of open ground, facetiously called a "green," or "common." Of enormous extent, and dreary sameness, the topography of Transpontis is necessarily of the vaguest character.

Mr. Trefalden knew, however, too good a dodger to be greatly baffled by the intricacies of any metropolitan neighborhood. He pursued his way with a Londoner's instinct, and, after traversing a few small squares and by-streets, found himself presently in face of Brudenell Terrace.

It was a very melancholy terrace, built according to the strictest logging-house order of architecture; it would seem four feet above the level of the str et, and approached by a dilapidated flight of stone steps at each extremity. It consisted of four-and-twenty dingy, eight-roomed houses, in one or other of which, take them at what season of the year one might, there was certain to be either a sale or a removal going forward. In conjunction with the inevitable van, or piece of hair-carving, might also be found the equally inevitable street organ—that "most miraculous organ" which can no more be silenced than the voice of murder itself; and which in Transpontis hath its chosen home. The oldest inhabitant of Brudenell Terrace confessed to never having known the hour of any day (except Sunday) when some interesting native of Parma or Lucca was not to be heard grinding his slow length along from number one to number twenty-eight. On the present occasion, however, when Mr. Trefalden knocked at the door of the house for which he was bound, both van and Italian boy were at the farther end of the row.

A slatternly servant of hostile bearing opened six inches of the door, and asked Mr. Trefalden what he wanted. That gentleman intimated that he wished to see Mrs. Rivière.

"Is it business?" said the girl, planting her feet sturdily against the six inches of the door.

Mr. Trefalden admitted that it was business.

"Then it's Miss Rivers you want," said she, sharply. "I didn't ought to have let you in."

Mr. Trefalden attempted to explain that he should prefer to see Mrs. Rivière if she would receive him at all; but that Miss Rivers was ready to entertain the proposition for a moment, and—

"It's nothing to me what you prefer," said she, with prompt indignation. "I'm sure I can see Mrs. Rivers. If Miss Rivers won't do, you may as well go away at once."

So the lawyer was fain to enter the citadel on such terms as he could get.

He was shown into a front-parlor, very poorly furnished. The window was partially darkened by a black blind, and close beneath it stood a table strewn with small pasteboard boxes and dyeing materials. A bonnet and shawl lay on the sofa behind the door. Three or four slight sketches in water-colors were pinned against the walls. An old-fashioned watch in a bronze stand of delicate foreign workmanship occupied the centre of the mantle-shelf; and in the farther corner of the room, between the fire-place and window, a tall, dark young woman in deep weeds with their faces to the wall. Mr. Trefalden divined the history of these little accessories at a glance. Any man of the world in his owners had told him so, that the watch and the canvases were relics of poor Edgar Rivière, and that the little water-colors were studies by the artist's daughter. These latter were very slight —mere outlines, with a dash of color here and there—but singularly free and graceful. One represented a fragment of Cyclopean wall, tapestried with creeping plant; another, a lonely wayside cross, with sugar-loaf mountains in the riding overhead; another, a group of stone pines at sunset, standing up, bronze and black, against a blood-red sky. All were instinct with that open-air look which defies imitation; and in the bold sketching of every one appeared the keen purple Tuscan hills. William Trefalden was no indifferent judge of art, and he saw at once that these were the work of a master.

While he was yet examining them the door opened noiselessly behind him, and a rustling of soft garments near at hand made him turn. He stood about half-way between the window and the door—a girl so fair, so slight, so transparent of complexion, so wonderfully fragile-looking, that the lawyer, for the first moment, could only look at her as at the most delicate piece of marvel of art, neither to be touched nor spoken to.

"You asked to see me, Sir?" she said, with a tremulous flash of color; for Mr. Trefalden still looked at her in silence.

"I asked to see Mrs. Rivière," he replied.

The young lady shook her head.

"My mother is an invalid," she said, "and can only be addressed through me. Will you take a seat?"

But Mr. Trefalden, instead of taking a seat, went over to the corner, where the dusty canvases were piled against the wall, and looked at them with a professional air.

"Are these some of your father's pictures?" Her whole face became radiant at the mention of that name.

"Yes," she replied, eagerly. "Do you know his works?"

Mr. Trefalden paused a moment before answering this question. Then, looking at her with a grave, serious tenderness, he said—

"I knew his works, my dear young lady—and I knew him."

"You knew him? Oh, you knew a good man, Sir, if you knew my dear, dear father!"

"A good man," said Mr. Trefalden, "and a fine artist."

Her eyes filled with sudden tears.

"If the world had but done him justice!" she murmured.

Mr. Trefalden thought he had never seen eyes so beautiful or so tender.

"The world never does justice to its finer spirits," said he, "till they have passed beyond reach of praise or blame, or of its praise. But his day of justice will come."

"Do you think so?" she said, drawing a little nearer, and looking up at him with the half-timid, half-trusting candor of a child. "Alas! I have always given up hoping."

"Never give up hoping. There is nothing in this world so unstable as its injustice—nothing so unstable as its praise and its reputation. Unhappily its laurels are too often showered upon tombs."

"Did you know him in Italy?"

"No—in England."

"Perhaps you were one of his fellow-students?"

Mr. Trefalden shook his head.

"No: I am a true lover of the arts," he replied, "but no artist. I had a sincere admiration for your father's genius, Miss Rivière, and this is my excuse for coming to see you to-day. I am anxious to know what pictures of his may still be in the possession of his family. I should be glad to purchase some, if I might be allowed to do so."

A look of intense gladness, followed by one of still more intense pain, flashed over the girl's pale face at these words.

"I trust I have said nothing to annoy you," said Mr. Trefalden, as deferentially as if this fragile young creature were a stately princess, clad in cloth of gold and silver.

"Oh no, thank you," she replied, tremulously. "We shall be very glad to—to sell them."

"Then I have your permission to look at these?"

"I will show them to you."

But Mrs. Trefalden would not suffer Miss Rivière to show him the pictures. They were too heavy and too dusty; and he was so glad to have the opportunity of seeing them that he considered nothing a trouble. Then he begged to be allowed to remove the black blind from the window; and this duly done he dragged out the first picture, dusted it carefully with his own white handkerchief, and placed it in the best light the room afforded.

"That was one of his last," said the daughter, with a sigh.

It represented Apollo and Daphne—Apollo in an attitude expressive of despair, looking very like a fine gentleman in an amateur play, elegantly pot up in the Greek style, and rather proud of his legs; with Daphne peeping at him suggestingly from the leaves of a laurel bush. It was not a vulgar picture, nor even a glaringly bad picture; but it had all the worst faults of the French school about it—none of its vigor, and was academic and superficial to the last degree.

Mr. Trefalden, who saw all this distinctly, retreated, nevertheless, to the farther side of the room, shaded his eyes with his hands, and declared that it was a most exquisite thing, full of poetry and classical feeling.

Then came a Cupid and Psyche on the point of leading off a dance, and a Juno in a car, attract of yellow ochre; and Endymion sleeping, evidently, on a stage-bank, by the light of a spectacular moon. Lady Family; a Cephalus and Procris; a Caractacus before Claudius; a Diana and Calisto, and about a score of others —enough to fill a room of moderate size; all after the same pattern; all repeating the same dreary round of hackneyed subjects; all equally correct and equally bad.

Mr. Trefalden looked patiently through the whole collection, opening out those envious which were rolled up, and going through the business of his part with a naturalness that was beyond all praise. Then, with an imaginary bow, he hesitated over trifling blemishes, reverted every now and then to his favorites, and, in short, played the connoisseur to perfection—a perfection that the poor child by his side was almost ready to fall down and worship him before the exhibition was over.

"How happy it would have made him to hear you, Sir!" she said, more than once. "No one ever appreciated him as you do!"

To which Mr. Trefalden only replied with sympathetic courtesy, that he was "sorry to hear it."

Finally, he selected four of the least objectionable of the lot, and begged to know on what terms he might be allowed to possess them.

This question was referred by Miss Rivière to her mother, to whom Mr. Trefalden was finally entrusted to name his own price.

"Nay, but you place me in a very difficult position," said he. "What if I offer too small a sum?"

"We do not fear that," replied the young girl, with a ready smile.

"You are very good; but—the fact is that I may wish to purchase several more of these interesting pictures in time to come. Miss Rivière should be willing to part from them."

"The whole of them?" she echoed, breathlessly.

"In the mean while," said he, "these being only my first, experiments, I must keep my expenditure within a moderate limit. I should not like to offer more than two hundred pounds for these four pictures."

Two hundred pounds! It was as if a tributary of Pactolus had suddenly flowed in upon that humble front-parlor and flooded it with gold. Miss Rivière could hardly believe in the material existence of so fabulous a sum.

"I hope I do not seem to under-estimate their value," said the lawyer.

"Oh, no, indeed!"

"You will, perhaps, submit my proposition to Mrs. Rivière?"

"No, thank you—I—I am quite sure—your great liberality—"

"I beg you will call it by no such name," said Mr. Trefalden, with that little depreciatory gesture that showed his fine hand to so much advantage. "Say, if you please, my sense of justice, or better still, my appreciation of excellence."

Here he took a little roll of bank-notes from his purse, folded, and laid them on the table.

"I trust I may be permitted to pay my respects to Mrs. Rivière," he next said, "before I go. She will not, perhaps, refuse the favor of an interview to one who knew her husband in his youth."

"I am sure mamma will be most happy," faltered Miss Rivière. "She is very delicate; but I know she will make the effort, if possible. We—we are going back soon to Italy."

And her eyes, as she said these words, wandered involuntarily toward the packet of notes.

"Not very soon, I hope? Not immediately?"

"Certainly, not immediately," she replied, with a sigh. "Mamma must be much better before she can travel."

Then Mr. Trefalden made a few politely sympathetic inquiries; recommended a famous West End physician; suggested a temporary sojourn at Sydenham or Norwood; and ended by requesting that the hostile maid-servant might fetch a cab for the conveyance of his treasures. He then took his leave, with the intimation that he would come again in the course of a few days, and go over the pictures a second time.

The door had no sooner closed behind him than Miss Rivière flew up to her mother's bedroom, with the bank-notes in her hand.

"Oh, mamma! mamma!" she cried, flinging herself on her knees beside the invalid's easy-chair, and bursting into sobs of joy, "he has taken four of papa's paintings, and given—oh! and do you see the figure?—given two hundred pounds for them! Two hundred pounds, all in beautiful, real bank-notes—and here they are! Touch them—look at them! Two hundred pounds—enough to take you to Italy, my darling, six times over!"

CHAPTER II.

BRADSHAW'S GUIDE FOR MARCH.

WILLIAM TREFALDEN sat alone in his private room, in a somewhat moody attitude, with his elbows on his desk, and his face buried in his hands. A folded deed lay unread before him. To his right stood a compact pile of letters with their seals yet unbroken. Absorbed in profound thought, he had not yet begun the business of the day, although more than an hour had passed since his arrival in Chancery Lane.

His meditations were interrupted by a tap at the door; and the next moment was unceremoniously followed by Mr. Reckwitch. The lawyer started angrily from his reverie.

"Why the deuce do you come in like that?" he exclaimed. "What do you want?"

"Beg your pardon, Sir," replied the head clerk, with a rapid glance at the pile of unopened letters and the unread deed. "Messenger's gone for Mr. Hawkes and Burbeck—and I only said I was to read it over to you before it went out."

Mr. Trefalden sighed impatiently, leaned back in his chair, and bade his clerk "go on;" whereat the respectable man drew the back of his hand across his mouth, and began.

"Know all men by these presents that we, Thomas Wilkes, of Hoxton, Cheesemonger, and Square in the parish of Hoxton in the County of Middlesex and John Barlow of Oakley villa in the parish of Camberwell in the aforesaid Middlesex Esquire, are jointly and severally holden and firmly bounden unto Ebenezer Foster, and Robert Corporation of Cornhill in the parish of St. Peters upon Cornhill in the County of Middlesex Bankers and copartners in the sum of two thousand pounds of lawful British money to be paid to the said Ebenezer Foster and Robert Corporation their executors administrators and assigns for which lawful attorney and attorneys for which payment to be well and faithfully made we bind ourselves jointly and severally and our and any two or one of our heirs executors and administrators firmly by these presents sealed with our respective seals. Dated ——, which I have left blank, Sir, not knowing when the signatures will be made."

"Quite right," said Mr. Trefalden, dreamily. "Go on."

The head clerk then proceeded in the same thick, monotonous tone, wading on from stage to stage, from condition to condition, till he came at length to—"Then and in such case the bonds herein and or obligation shall become void and of no effect, or else shall remain in full force, power, and virtue" having read which, he came to a dead pause.

And then again, for the third time, Mr. Trefalden said—

"Go on."

Mr. Reckwitch smiled, maliciously.

"That's the end of the deed, Sir," he replied. "The end of the deed!"

"Yes, Sir. It struck me that you didn't hear much of it. Be so good as to begin it again?"

Mr. Trefalden bit his lip with unconcealed annoyance.

"Certainly not," he said, sharply. "That voice of yours sends me to sleep. Leave the bonds here, and I will peruse them myself."

So saying, he snatched the paper from the hand of his clerk, pointed to the door, and commanded himself to go through the document from beginning to end.

This done, and the messenger dispatched, he dropped again into his accustomed seat, and proceeded mechanically to examine his diurnal correspondence. He only mechanically looked through the letters with the lawyer, holding it open with his left hand, and shading his eyes with his right, as he read. But the thoughts which blotted out the sense of the words as completely as if the page were blank before him.

By-and-by he looked at it vacantly for some ten minutes or more. William Trefalden crushed the letter in his hand, flung it on the table, and exclaimed half aloud, "Fool that I am!" pushed his chair hastily back, and began walking up and down the room.

Sometimes he was somewhat elderly, sometimes stopping short in his beat for a minute at a time, the lawyer continued for the best part of an hour to pace to and fro between the window and the door, thinking earnestly.

Of what? Of a woman.

He could scarcely bring himself to confess it to his own thoughts; and yet so it was—a fact not to be explained, impossible to palliated. William Trefalden was in love for the first time in his life; utterly, passionately in love.

Yes, for the first time. He was thirty-eight years of age, and he had never in his life known what it was to feel as he felt now. He had never known what it was to live under the despotism of a single idea. He was not a good man. He was an unscrupulous and radically selfish man. A man of cultivated taste, cold heart, and iron will. A man who set his own gratification before him as the end for which he lived, and who was content to labor for that end as unfeelingly and steadfastly as other men labor for honor, or freedom, or their soul's salvation. A man who knew no law save the law of his own will, and no restraint save the restraint of his own judgment.

Up to this time he had regarded love as a taste, and looked upon women much in the same light as he looked upon fine wines, fine pictures, costly books, and valuable horses. They were one of the enjoyments of life—rather more troublesome, though, than some of the main enjoyments, and less than other enjoyments; needing to be well-dressed, as books to be well bound, or pictures well framed; needing also, like valuable horses, to be kindly treated; but, like horses, to be held or changed at the pleasure of their owners.

Such was the theory, and such (for this secret may as well be told here as elsewhere) was the practice of William Trefalden's life. He was no gamester. He was no miser. He was no sensualist. He was simply that dangerous phenomenon—a man of cold heart and warm imagination; a refined voluptuary.

And this was the secret which for long years he had guarded with such jealous care. He loved splendor, luxury, pleasure. He loved elegant surroundings, a well-appointed table, well-trained servants, music, pictures, books, fine wines, fine eyes, and fine tobacco. For these things he had toiled harder than the poorest artist in the land. For these things he had risked danger and disgrace; and yet now, when he held the game on which he had staked his whole life secure in his hand—secure, in the very moment of success—this man found that the world contained one thing for which he would willingly have given all the rest—nay, without which all the rest would be no longer worth possessing.

Only a girl! Only a pale, pretty, dark-haired girl, with large, timid eyes, and a soft voice, and a color like snow and red rose-leaf when she spoke. A girl with ancient blood in her veins, and a certain childlike purity of bearing that told at once the first glance how she must be neither lightly sought nor lightly won. A girl who, though she might be poor to begin with, could no more be bought like a toy than could an angel be brought from heaven.

It was unendurable for William Trefalden to love such a girl as Helen Rivière! He knew that it was madness. He had a dim feeling that it might be ruin. He struggled against it—he fought with it—he flung himself into work, but all in vain. He was no longer master of his actions. He had, in fact, no longer any will. He was simply a man driven by a single passion, and tormented by the slave of a mysterious power. It was vain to resist. Well might he pace to and fro in utter restlessness of mind and body! Well might he curse his fate and his folly, and chafe against the chain that he was impotent to break! He had known strong impulses, angry passions, angry desires, often enough in the course of his undisciplined life; but never, till now, that passion or desire which was stronger than his own impulses.

In the mean while the soul of Abel Keckwitch was disquieted within him. His quick ear caught the restless echo in the inner room, and he felt more than ever convinced that there was "something wrong somewhere." Mr. Trefalden had not opened his letters. Mr. Trefalden had not read the deed which awaited him upon his desk. Mr. Trefalden had not attended to the needs of the important bond which he, Abel Keckwitch, notwithstanding his asthma, had laboriously read through from beginning to end, only the day before this all. Mr. Trefalden looked pale and anxious, like a man who had not slept the night before, and was grievously troubled in his mind. These were significant facts—facts very perplexing and unusual; and Mr. Keckwitch sorely taxed his ingenuity to interpret them aright.

In the midst of his conjectures Mr. Trefalden, who had sat in a moody silence in the further banquet twelve, came out of his private room, and, glancing round the office, said:

"Where are those paintings that I brought home the other day?"

Mr. Keckwitch tacked his pen behind his ear, and coughed before replying.

"In the cupboard behind the door, Sir," said he. "I put them—to be out of the way."

Mr. Trefalden opened the cupboard door, saw that the pictures were safe within, and, after a moment's hesitation, said:

"I took them for a bad debt, but they are of no use to me. You can have them, Keckwitch, if you like."

"I, Sir!" exclaimed the head clerk, in accents of virtuous horror. No, thank you, Sir. None of your indecent Venuses for me. I should be ashamed to see 'em on the walls!"

"As you please. At all events, any one who likes to take them is welcome to do so."

Saying which, Mr. Trefalden, with a slightly scornful gravity, left his clerks to settle the question of ownership among themselves, and went on his way. The pictures were, of course, had out immediately, and became the objects of a good deal of tittering, tossing up, and wit of the smallest kind. In the mean while the head clerk found a pretext for going to the inner room, and instituted a rapid search for any stray scrap of information that might turn up.

It was a forlorn hope. Mr. Keckwitch had done the same thing a hundred times before, and had never found any thing; save, now and then, a few charred ashes in the empty grate. But it was in his nature to persevere doggedly. On the present occasion he examined the papers on the table, lifted the lid of William Trefalden's desk, peered between the leaves of the blotting-book, and examined the table-drawers in which the lawyer kept his stationery. In the latter he found but one unaccustomed article—an old continental Bradshaw for the month of June.

"It never was in this morning," mused this amateur detective, taking up the Guide and turning it over inquisitively. "It's the same he had in when he went to that place in Switzerland—page turned down and all."

And then Mr. Keckwitch uttered a suppressed exclamation, for the turned-down page was in the midst of the Italian itinerary.

"Lucca—Magadino—Mantua—Mentone—Milan."

What, in Heaven's name, could William Trefalden have to do with Lucca, Magadino, Mantua, Mentone, or Milan? How was it possible that any one of these places should be mixed up with the course of his present unfortunate preoccupation?

The clerk was fairly puzzled. Finding, however, no further clew in any part of the volume, he returned to his desk, and applied himself to diligent search of the financial columns of the Times.

He would have been still more puzzled if, at this moment, he could have seen his master, pale, pallid, with the same weary, half-impatient look upon his face, leaning over the parapet of the Temple Gardens, and gazing idly at the flow of the river. It was just one o'clock—the quietest hour of the day in nurse-maid-haunted square and garden. And Mr. Trefalden was himself. All was still and dreamy in the old garden. Not a leaf stirred upon the trees. The sunlight scorched the cloistered silence. The very sky was gray and uniform, unbroken by a sunbeam or a cloud. Presently a barge drifted by, with the tide current; while far away, from crowded bridge and busy street, there rose a deep and distant hum, unlike the other sounds with which the ear of man is familiar.

It was a dreamy day and a dreamy place, and upon such a day and in such a place, to all appearance, as dreamy as either. But it is possible to be dreamy on the surface and full of excitement underneath. And Mr. Trefalden's dreaminess was of that outward sort alone. All moody quiet without, but fierce, stormy, fiery agony within.

The man's whole life was in a state of tumultuous conflict. Reject after project, resolution after resolution, kept rising like bubbles to the troubled surface of his mind, only to vanish in breaking, vanishing, and giving place to others. Thus an hour went by, and Mr. Trefalden, bearing the chimes announce the close of the first hour with the air of a man whose course is resolved upon, and went out through Temple Bar, into the Strand. His course was resolved upon. He had made up his mind never to see Helen Rivière again; and yet—

And yet, before he had reached the gates of Somerset House he had hailed a cab, and declared the driver to take him to Bruton-st Terrace, Camberwell.

In the mean while Mr. Keckwitch, who had been anxiously awaiting the striking prices of the sorts of Italian Railway, Banking, Telegraphic and Land Companies' Stock, believed that he had caught sight of the right figures, and that when he read that the Great Milanese Loan and Finance Company's Six per Cent Bonds were down to sixteen and a half on the official list.

STORY OF THE FERRY-MAN'S DAUGHTER.

In the British Museum is a singularly curious, although probably fabulous, tract of 30 pages, entitled "The Right Discovery of the Long-hidden Death of old John Overs, the rich Ferry-man of London, showing how he lost his life by his own covetousness, and how his daughter Mary discovered the Church of St. Mary Overs in Southwark to be built; and of the building of London Bridge." The Right Discovery, however, is by no means what any Bridge at all built over the Thames, there was only a Ferry, to which divers boats belonged, to transport all Passengers thereat between the Old Church-yard Alley, that being the high-road way between Kingston and Canterbury, which is now at Vickeborg 9815, and at Mission Ridge 1900; at Gainesville, Georgia, 1900; at Bean Station, Tennessee, at Cane Swamp, and Malvern Hill Section 10,000, and at Wilderness 28,000; Buenda at Fredericksburg 12,000; at Chancellorsville 10,000; at Gettysburg 10,000; at Rapidan, in his final campaign, to surrender of Lee, are computed at 80 per cent.

CITIES AND CHARGE.—There were two short-sighted men who were always complaining as to which of them was the best: and as they heard there was to be a tablet erected on the gate of a neighboring temple that mentioned they would visit it together on a given day and put the visual powers of each to the test. On each deciding to waive advantage of the other, Ching went immediately to the temple, and looking carefully at the tablet, came away in position with the words, "To the great man of the past and the future." Chang also, after trying the gate, came in addition to the inscription, "To the great man of the past and the future." Ching, from reading the tablet, thought he better was raised by the family of Ling in honor of the great man of the past, and therefore intending at a convenient hour which neither could read, Ching exclaimed, "The inscription is, 'To the great man of the past and the future.'" "True," said Chang, "but you have left out a part of the inscription, which is, 'Erected by the family of Ling.' What is written in small characters: 'Erected by the family of Ling,' in honor of the great man of the past and the future.' inscription," said Ching. "There is," said Chang. So they stared at each, and, after shaking one another, agreed to refer the matter to the high-priest of the temple. He heard their story, and quietly said, "Gentlemen, there is no tablet to read; it was taken into the interior of the temple yesterday."

A GOOD JOKE ON GENERAL SHERMAN.—While marching through Georgia, Sherman was riding with his staff at the wing, under General Slocum. After a long and wearisome march, he sat down to rest near to the spot where General Howard. While in General Howard's tent, which had just been pitched, the Major-General was busily and inquisitive with the habits and customs of both.—General Sherman sometimes took a "glass," while General Howard was strongly opposed to the indulgence. Knowing this the medical gentleman, after a short time, wishing to serve his chief without offence to Howard, said:

"General Sherman, you look weary and ill. If you will come over to my tent I will give you a Sedlitz Powder, which I think will do you good."

"Thank you," readily responded "Tecumseh," "I think I will."

The man of phyzic departed, and General Howard, who took every thing literally, run to his valise and got a powder, which he mixed and handed to Sherman.

"There is no need to go away for one, if that is what you want," he said, as Sherman, somewhat surprised, but highly amused, drank the cup unsuitably, to the mirth of his staff and escort officers, who comprehended the magnitude of the joke at a glance.

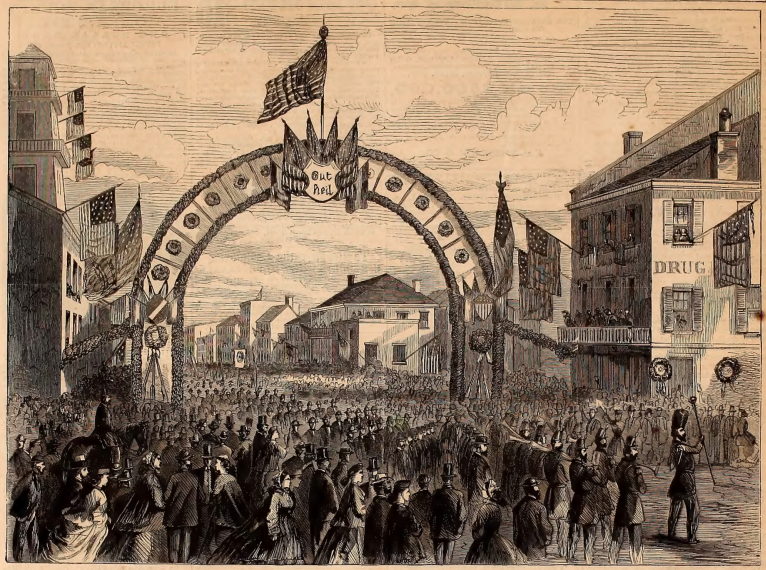
THE JEWISH RACE.—For eighteen hundred years the Hebrews have been dispersed into different latitudes and climates, but they have preserved themselves the most distinct from any long-existent with the other races of the earth. The Jews of North Carolina are, Abrahams, several of the Jordan, have been oppressed by the successive conquerors of Palestine, ages—Jew from Africa is described by trust-worthy travellers as being black as any of the Ethiopian race. Hebrews of the North are distinguished by dealing in European civilization, and dwelling in the northern nations, their tendency is to light complexion, the blue eyes and the light hair of the Scandinavian families. The Jews that have come to the United States are a class without having to refer them to original or specific distinctions.

THE number of battles fought during the last war was two hundred and fifty-two. Of these the soil of Virginia drank the blood in two hundred and one—Tennessee thirty-seven, Missouri thirty-five, Georgia twelve, South Carolina ten, North Carolina nine, Alabama seven, Florida five, Kentucky fourteen, the Indian Territory and New Mexico one each. Three battles were fought also in Northern States and broke in the great Indian of Gettysburg. Of the battles mentioned sixteen were great encampments.

A RECENT DUEL.—Perhaps the most remarkable duel ever fought took place in 1855. It was peculiarly French in its origin, and in the fact that it was fought not with any other than a French state of society. M. Le Crampes and M. Le Pique lived in a quarrel, arising out of a question concerning a lady engaged at the Imperial Opera. They agreed to fight with Colt's Navy revolvers, and it was settled that the boat of angry passions should not interfere with the duel. On the appointed day, they proposed the duel for a month, the lady agreeing to leave her rival to the enjoyment of the opera. But no one was killed; or, at all events, this was inferred by the two seconds, if not actually proved, by the absence of dirty linen in the air. The balloons were constructed precisely alike. On the signal being given, both parties at once entered the car of one balloon, Le Pique and his second that of the other. It was in the direction of Fontainebleau the immense concourse of spectators. The gentlemen were by this time at a height of about a mile and a halfwere, in order to bring them down by the escape of gas, made to descend slightly lower than the spectators, each servant took a bombazine in his car. At a given signal the ropes were severed, and the cars were left to the balloons ascended. The wind was moderate, and kept the balloons at about their original distance from the parts apart. When half a mile above the surface of the earth a correspondence of fire was commenced. M. Le Crampes fired, but missed. M. Le Crampes fired and sent a ball through M. Le Pique's balloon. The latter gentleman, the car descended with frightful rapidity, and M. Le Pique and his second were killed on the spot. The survivors continued his secant triumphantly, and terminated his aerial voyage successfully at a distance of 30 miles from Paris.

THE CHOLERA.—The Commercial Advertiser says the cholera was long a familiar pestilence in the marshes of the Ganges, and in 1784, destroyed 90,000 lives in the Hindostan. It began its march around the world in 1817, was exceedingly destructive every where, especially in Calcutta, extending thence to Naples in the North, and to Iran and Java in the South. In 1826 Russia was invaded, and 150,000 lives were taken. In 1831 the pestilence reached Great Britain and Ireland, and in other roads, appeared in Persia and Asia Minor. Here it halted for two years. In 1848 it appeared in Sunderland, and in the next year at Moscow. In 1851 it broke out in Central Europe, and in September, 1853, it was first discovered on the 8th of June it appeared in Quebec, and thirteen days later in New York. Thence it spread over all the country, first appearing along the great lines of travel. In 1854 the disease was at its height in New York, and from that time it has often made its appearance here. In 1849 the disease was at its height in the north part of a great tour of the world, similar to that noted above. Its ravages were more fatal than in 1832, and the disease was of a more severe manageable. For several successive years the cholera ago, and in all parts of the country, becoming in some places almost an acclimated disease.

THERE are few transformations in the whole range of the arts to be more striking than that which the Bible which gives birth to glass. A heap of sand and soda—it used to be of sand and ashes—is all that is necessary to make it, changed by the simple application of heat into solid, transparent, brilliant glass. It is even more wonderful, that the transformation of a handful of dirty rags into a sheet of white paper.



In Austria and some other parts of Germany the custom is to shoe one horse at a time, and the Austrian has some advantages. The ladies must certainly like it, and the custom will be found to suit them. The lady of fashion likes to wait to bake a dance, and not to be introduced to something that she does not want to know. In Austria, where a ballroom introduction is considered valid, and the gentleman who introduces to the lady of the house, whether afterward would be put down as uncommonly rude. Austrian ladies are not to be introduced on their account of their dancing, which is celebrated, but for their agreeable and lively conversation. In the other parts of Europe, they are nevertheless perfectly well-bred, and have that true natural vivacity which is the best security against any unfair use of an unconstrained intercourse between people.

LOVE OF MARRIED LIFE.—The affection that links together man and wife is a far holier and more enduring passion than people think. It may well be sometimes, as may was its imaginative character, that it is the offer of the heart and hand, but it is not long before the absence of love is made manifest. "Love in a cottage" is a phrase which "sounds like a romance," we are to believe that the fire is extinct, and that the ashes of the hearth. Nothing can be more delightful than the old dreams of affection. Nothing can be more delightful than the old dreams of affection. Nothing can be more delightful than the old dreams of affection.

A BOLD GENERALISM.—The father of Frederick the Great, a lieutenant of Peter, was famous for exercise. On his son he could lay his hands upon for his famous regiments of giant grenadiers. The prince married his grandmother's very large women, but was disappointed in his attempt to breed giants. He experimented, however, as well as creating the different breeds of Shanghais. His mammoth grenadiers, although not giants, were the finest and most gigantic pig-tails, or queues. They were ordered to be cut off. The prince was told that the men would not be recruited for parzzled pig-tail in open defiance of the ukase. "Cut off the pig-tails from the dead men," said he, "and bring them to me." The pig-tails were brought to him

PARIS FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

SOMETHING like a tendency to return to modes of a more simple description characterizes the Paris fashions for the month of September. Whether this gratifying symptom be owing to the severe castigation of the eccentricities and extravagance of ladies' toilets inflicted by M. DUPIN (who has been vigorously seconded by many of the French journalists), or to the absence of the Court and aristocracy from Paris, is a question that can only be resolved after the return of the high-life folks to their habitual quarters. Whatever may be the solution, it is to be remarked at this season that the dresses at least have returned to a style of simplicity that can not fail to be approved by the paymasters-general of the dress-maker department. Plain materials, the employment of little or no ornament, a diminution in the empâtre of the robes, indicate, at any rate, a short interval of sobriety in the taste of the Parisians.

A great variety of new buttons have just been introduced for dress fastenings. Some of the larger descriptions are flat, but the round ones in ebony or lighter wood, steel, dead gold, bone, or ivory, are preferred, as being more convenient.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Dress for Little Girl.—Dark-blue silk robe, fastened behind with a buttoning band, edged with black velvet and white lace. The short sleeves are ornamented in a similar manner. Fine Tuscan hat, bordered with narrow black velvet, and trimmed with white lace, and provided with a white gauze veil.

Fig. 2. Half-length Costume of dress finished with dark gray stripes; the ornaments on the polonie in gros grain passementerie of the same color, headed and stringed; the collose gauzed veil worn as a mode almost entirely concealing the chignon.

Fig. 3. Dress for a Carriage Promenade, a rich stripe of thin cashmere, including the jupon, in fair grain orange lines. The skirt is drawn up, and attached with rosettes, fastened by buttons; the corsage is plain, high-necked, and provided with a wide waistband.

The same material as the dress, and without any ornament. Tuscan hat, trimmed on one side with a tuft of corn; long light-blue gauze veil.

Fig. 4. Dress for a Little Girl, made of white muslin, trimmed round the undulating edge of the skirt and round the outline of the vest with striped ruguese velvet. The ornament on the skirt itself is of black satin. Cingean ornament, decorated with magenta ribbons and a garland of marguerites. High-heeled black kid boots.

THE "WINOOSKI" AND "ALGONQUIN."

ALTHOUGH there has, at this writing, been no direct issue made between the Winooski and the Secretary of the Navy Department, and Mr. DICKERSON's double-ender, the Algonquin, yet in some important respects both vessels have tested their comparative power. The Algonquin showed the following results in the unofficial trial:

Revolutions per minute	19
Pressure of steam in pounds	66
Vacuum in inches	24
Cutting off at about	6 inches
Throttle valve	wide open

The Winooski's engine gave the following results:

Revolutions per minute	12
Pressure of steam in pounds	30
Vacuum in inches	24
Cutting off at	6-10 of stroke
Throttle valve	wide open

Consumption of coal about 400 pounds per hour.

Certainly, from the results above given, the contest as regards maximum power was likely to prove a losing one for the Algonquin.

CONSTITUTION

LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician to Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigation of the learned—united and scientific to cure which have so puzzled at the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any reformer.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick;" while others doubt their permanency, and think that diseases can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our theory: In health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scales.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

SCROFULA.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the vicious form of this disease, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the GREAT LIFE-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

DEPRESSION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SOROFULA.

BUBOMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, SORE EYES, SALT RHEUM, BAD BREATH.

RHEUMATISM.

[ARTHRITIS, LUMBAGO, SCIATICA, GOUT, OR RHEUMATISM.]

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated—sometimes swellings are reduced. Cases, chronic or recent, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the bad Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other difficulties of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Moth Patches upon the female face, depending upon a disordered state of the Liver, are very successfully met by the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will restore the secretion, and remove the deposit, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Kidneys, such as Dropsy, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an ulcerated or cancerous condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or similar unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, one can only scarcely in the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

Brandreth's Pills

Not only thwarts the blood from impurities, but they make it rich in those great qualities upon which its health and strength to resist disease depend. Where obstruction has laid bare ligament and bone, and when no means seemed likely to save life, patients have, by Brandreth's Pills, been restored to health, as the record of thousands willingly testify.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

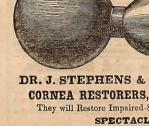
P.S.—Dr. J. STEPHENS & CO. have invented and patented a MYOPIA, or CORNEA FLATTENER, for the cure of Near-Sightedness, which has proved a great success. Write for a Circular.

WANTED—AGENTS—in every city and county in the United States, to canvass for "LIFE AND LABOR, or, Memoirs of Sojourner Truth," a Portrait of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, Medallion Allegorical Portrait of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, effected by rubbing, through which, as through a gauze screen, the marker perceives "a most striking and perfect likeness"—the light and heavy shadings of the letters forming the Medallion lines of the Portrait—surrounding which are suggestive sketches.

Also, Portrait of WASHINGTON, effected in same manner by fac-simile draught of DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. "The peculiar yet perfect manner in which they are brought forth make them at once objects of admiration." They are NEW ground, fac-similes from the original writing and pen-drawing.

The highest testimonials ever awarded any engravings have been received from the President, Generals Scott, Grant, Sherman, and the most eminent men of our country. OVER 24,000 COPIES WERE SOLD BY AGENTS IN JULY AND AUGUST. Parties applying for an agency will specify the County wanted.



Send stamp for Circulars, with terms to Agents, who can clear $20 00 a day, if energetic. Address

MACHINE.

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity.

Originally patented May 13, 1860; improvements patented June 5, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most wonderful and elegantly constructed Novelty, is SURPASSING in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, sews with DOUBLE or SINGLE THREAD. Makes the running-stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity. Will HEMMER, HEM, RUFFLE, BRAID, TUCK, RUN TO GATHERS, &c., &c.; requires no lubrication or change of stitch; is NOT CHARGED TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and will last A LIFETIME. It is NOT A SMALL CHEAP MACHINE, but is warranted to do as much work as any three by hand.

"For the Dressmaker it is invaluable; for the household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Ladies' Book.

"It is such a common thing to have very rapidly, that it is easily understood that a child can use it."—Independent.

"With ships or clothes blessed, it certainly fits very rapidly with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand-sewing, and is very durable."

"It beats who buy or offer for sale imitations of this great invention. We will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents. Single machines sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Agents wanted every where. Circular, containing highly flattering testimonials, sent free.

THE FRENCH NAVAL FLEET AT PORTSMOUTH.

LAST week we printed an excellent engraving illustrating the international naval festival of the French and English fleets at Cherbourg. We give this week a picture illustrating the arrival of the French fleet at Portsmouth, England. This arrival was followed by a brilliant series of festivities commencing August 28, in which the DUKE OF SOMERSET, the French Minister of Marine, the local authorities of Brest, Cherbourg, and Portsmouth, and the officers and men of the rival and allied squadrons participated.

The three weeks consumed in this mutual interchange of naval courtesies probably gave neither of the two nations any new information in regard to the fleets of the other. It is said that the French ships are faster and less perfectly protected by armor, while the superiority in weight of ordnance rests with England. The English think that this balance of advantages is much in their favor. Says the Saturday Review: "Admiral FARRAGUT sailed into the harbor of Mobile in a wooden ship, and some other American officers have expressed a doubt whether the advantage of armor-plating provides a compensation for its inevitable cumbrousness. If guns can be used at sea heavy enough to pierce any vessel which can float, it appears not impossible that the lightest and most fragile ships may ultimately prove to be the safest."

Now if we are not mistaken our navy has advantages both in respect of weight of ordnance and fleetness of vessels. M. MARS, who is no other than the PRINCE DE JOINVILLE, has contributed a paper on this subject to the Revue des Deux Mondes, showing that America has taught foreign nations two lessons: First, that the armament of a ship of war with the heaviest guns is of more importance than defensive armor; and, secondly, that a system of coast protection by fleets of small Monitors and swarms of torpedoes might prove too formidable even for such ships as the Solferino or the Warrior. The résumé which he gives of the decisive naval events of the war goes some way to support his theories.

When the Merrimac encountered the first Monitor, she was beaten by her smaller adversary simply because the Northern ship carried the heaviest ordnance. The Atlanta was the next ironclad ram which the Confederates produced, and she too was beaten by the Weehawken, a Monitor of half her size. The Atlanta carried 7-inch rifled guns, and was protected by four inches of iron inclined at an angle of about 30 degrees, backed by eighteen inches of wood. Her enemy was armed with 15-inch guns, and four shots sufficed to compel the Atlanta to strike her colors. The third ram, the Albemarle, which was built by the Confederates, served only to illustrate the second point on which M. MARS insists—the value of torpedoes, when used with skill and audacity. She lay moored up the Roanoke, and was blown out of the water by a torpedo coolly fixed and fired by a United States lieutenant and a boat's crew of half a dozen men.

The PRINCE DE JOINVILLE evidently deems the American system of naval warfare more formidable than the French. "We have nothing," he says, "equivalent to the American 15-inch gun." While the French field and siege guns are excellent, the Prince considers the French naval gun, which is intended to smash iron-plates, quite another thing. The American Monitors are invulnerable to the best guns carried by the Magenta or by any other French vessel, while the guns carried by the Monitors could smash the iron-plates of the best French vessel with perfect ease.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1865.

THE SYRACUSE CONVENTION.

THE Convention of the Union party at Syracuse was singularly harmonious. It had no "proud record" to expunge, no shuffling words or deeds to forget, no professions of an entirely new faith to make. Always true to the Union and Government, it had but to congratulate itself upon their triumph. Always faithful to the equal rights of man, it had but to rejoice at the great fact of emancipation. Not having officially insulted the soldiers who have saved the country, it had only to renew the expression of its gratitude; and having elected Andrew Johnson in full confidence in his devoted patriotism, it had not to express that confidence with lips still foaming with the foulest abuse of him. Always careful of the national honor, it had but to repeat that the debt is a sacred obligation upon all the property and resources of the country, and on all its ranks are full of men of tried and perfect loyalty, it had no occasion to snatch its candidates from those who had scornfully repudiated its principles and policy.

The Convention met at noon and dissolved before midnight, having done its good work. The resolutions are plain and satisfactory. They congratulate the State upon the return of peace, and thank the soldiers and sailors, calling upon the Government to provide for the support of the disabled. They offer to the President a cordial and effective support. They approve his sentiments of kindness and confidence toward the late rebels; and declare that the people of the disaffected States may be intrusted with political power so soon as the safety of the nation will permit. They declare the right of equal rights, the Union Convention trusts that, when the public safety will allow the renewed exercise of political rights in the States lately rebellious, it will be granted in the faith and upon the basis that they will be exercised in a spirit of justice, and with a view to the elevation and perpetuation of all the rights of citizenship of all their people, "inasmuch as these are principles which constitute the basis of our republican institutions."

There is no taint of treason, no smell of State sovereignty, upon the clean robes of the Union party; and this vast body of the truest American citizens do not hesitate to declare their faith in fair play for all men. They further call for a reduction of the public expenditure, and a restoration of the civil courts so far as the national safety will permit. They declare the inviolability of the national debt, and with the Government repudiate the rebel debt. They approve the administration of Governor Sexton, sympathize with Mr. Seward, and call upon the State to send the honestest men to the Legislature, that corruption may be avoided.

Upon this platform the Convention placed as candidates both soldiers and civilians, some of them new to public political life, but all of them tried and true citizens whose character and ability have been fully tested. Ward Hunt and John K. Porter were nominated by acclamation for Judges of the Court of Appeals.

The political contest now fairly opened can have nothing of personality. The main question to be decided, is really national and not political. We are to declare what we would have the policy of reorganization. Shall it be that of the Democratic party, which surrenders the disaffected States wholly into the hands of men like Wade Hampton and Herschell V. Johnson; or that of the Union party, which declines to surrender the control of those States until the public safety is secured? Do we wish to have the Alinsey Regency and the New York Daily News do the work of penitence, or desire it be accomplished by those whose Unionism has been proved by fire, who have never excused the wicked and fatal rebellion, and who believe that the existence of a privileged class is not republican, and is fatal to the welfare of the people.

General Slocum, Mr. Lucius Robinson, and Mr. Martin Grover, are nominated by a party whose real views and feeling they do not represent. Mr. General Slocum is in common with John A. Green? What has Lucius Robinson in common with the Daily News? Have Green and the News come to these gentlemen, or have the gentlemen gone over to them? Of course nobody believes that either is the case. The party wishes to come into power, and does not care by what means. Its nomination of men who do not sympathize with its tendencies is merely a cunning tribute to the intelligence and patriotism of the State. The Democratic party knows it could have no hope of success but by wearing a mask; and it chooses one of patriotic features.

What title has this party—identified with every disgraceful and unpatriotic sentiment and act of the last five years—to the confidence of the State of New York against the great Union party of steadfastly loyal men so admirably characterized by Senator Foster, the temporary Chairman of the Syracuse Convention, as "a great and powerful—not by the accident of a day not by the chance result of a single political combination, but by years of adherence to plainly promulgated principle; by persistent patriotic adherence to the country's cause in the time of the country's extremity; by steadfast faith in the fundamental principles of American nationality, impartial rights protected by impartial justice, administered under impartial laws flowing from impartial representation based upon impartial suffrage?

SOUTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

THE South Carolina Convention was opened by a Message from Provisional Governor Perry, which has been published in most of the daily papers, and has undoubtedly been widely read and pondered. Does any thoughtful man, who earnestly desires the pacification of the country, believe that the spirit of that Message promises well for such a result? We are all exhorted to conciliation. If Governor Perry's Message represents the Rebel assent, indeed, some prodigious truths. He summons the Convention to recognize that slavery in South Carolina is dead. He says that the question has been entered with indignant incredulity. Moreover, Governor Perry says that, until an organic law of South Carolina prohibits slavery forever, South Carolina can not hope to resume her place in the Union. We can imagine the expressive silence of the Convention as these words were read.

But from such a positive statement of the actual situation at the outset what might naturally have been expected of the rest of the Message? Might we not have looked for a sincere and conciliatory recommendation that the Convention should accept the situation? Or, if too much to expect that Governor Perry would suggest that, as more than half the population of the State had been hitherto slaves and were now citizens, the Convention should be provided for their speedy education and elevation to all the equal rights of men and duties of citizens? Would a wise man and patriotic statesman recommend a Convention which, from that more than half the population of the State should be permanently degraded into a pariah class? And how does Governor Perry, governor venture, under the circumstances, upon a bold assertion of the falsehood that "this is a white man's Government, and intended for white men only?" A very slight acquaintance with the history of eighty and ninety years ago would have corrected this error of Governor Perry's, who, in like manner, ventures to repeats the enormous and false assertion of Judge Taney in the Dred Scott decision.

Does Governor Perry suppose that the men who signed the Declaration of Independence did not know the meaning of the words they used? "All men" no more means all white men than all red men or all black men mean what it says. The contemporary words of the leaders of the Revolution show what they thought upon this subject. And the Chief Justice Judge Taney himself can not help admitting that every person who, upon its adoption was a citizen of one of those States became a citizen of the United States; and at that time colored persons were equal citizens in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and North Carolina. Mr. Chief Justice Judge Curtis, in controverting the Chief Justice, "it is not true in point of fact that the Constitution was made exclusively by the white race. In five of the free colored persons were then citizens of at least five States.....they were among those for whom and whose posterity the Constitution was ordained and established."

Indeed, so far as regards the vital question now at issue in the country—the status of the colored part of the population—Governor Perry's Message merely echoes the spirit of the Dred Scott opinion of Judge Taney. Can it be expected that a Convention, acting in such a spirit, can offer to the Congress of the United States "such a republican form of government as will entitle South Carolina to the guarantee of the United States therefor?" Is there any reasonable hope that such a Convention will change the organic law to secure or suggest legislation to maintain the equality which is the spring of all republican government?

The welfare of the disaffected States is, in the first instance, in the hands of the citizens of these Conventions. Every loyal man in the land sincerely wishes that their action may be such as to reveal a disposition which may be safely trusted by the country. There may have doubted whether such would be the result; have yet patiently awaited the meeting and action of the Conventions, and the assembling of Congress to end. But the earnest mind of the country must be even now asking the question whether the action of these bodies thus far is such as to prove that the States may be safely left to the domination of the class which alone appears in the Conventions.

The responsibility is theirs, not ours. Wade Hampton, a delegate to this South Carolina Convention, has openly advised the late rebels to remain in the State, and by every means they can to save it: that is, to perpetuate discord in the Union. The allies of the rebels in this part of the country exhort them to fight out "what remains of the contest." So be it. The choice is theirs. But if they choose to fight it out, do they suppose we shall not? If they could not beat us in the field, do they suppose we shall suffer them to outwit us in council? Do they suppose that we do not mean to finish our work? Do they suppose that the people of the United States, having won peace by a costly war, do not mean to secure peace?

If they think so, if they will work with us, if they will honestly accept the situation, we shall gladly secure it together. If they will not, we shall still secure it. We ask for no injustice to any man, white or black. We ask only for equal justice for all men, since it is demonstrated that the Union can stand on no other foundation.

TRY AGAIN.

It is pleasant to see how cheerfully Captain Anderson writes, and Mr. Field talks, and the Company resolves upon the subject of the new Atlantic Cable next year. Ocean cables cost money. If the good public will only raise one or two millions of dollars more they shall have their cable. A new one can hardly be made for less than half a million of pounds. But for that the proposition is to depend upon the profits of a success in laying it. A million or so only will cover current expenses. We see no lack feeling in the matter of the cable as we do about the Hoosic Tunnel, that it will be "put through." If not by this Company and this route, then by others, the work will surely be done.

The same spirit animates the Arctic explorers. It stimulated the exploration of the Nile until its sources were discovered; and no failure, no eternal ice, no fate of Franklin or Kane can disheaten the genius of Arctic discovery. Captain Hall, whose book, published a few months since, is acknowledged, by the most competent foreign and domestic critics, to be one of the most truly interesting and valuable in the Arctic literature, is already far up once more among the frozen seas. And Dr. Petermann, a well-known German geographer, is stimulating to arrange a new expedition upon a new theory. He is confident that the influence of the Gulf Stream extends into the Polar regions. Dr. Petermann lives Zembla and Spitzbergen. Dr. Petermann offers a large premium to sailors to engage in the voyage to test his theory. It is even reported that an English steamer is chartered for the purpose, and will sail from Hammerfest along the eastern shore of Spitzbergen, and if practicable, as far as Behring's Straits. Merchants of Edinburg have subscribed a large part of the money; and should the experiment prove the soundness of Dr. Petermann's belief, a large and important expedition will doubtless follow.

We record such facts with sympathy and admiration. The earth was given to man to subdue, and neither tropic heat, nor polar cold, nor the waves of the sea, nor the sand of the desert, can deter him from his destiny. The great old British soldier, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, sailed away to the North Pole three centuries ago, and was never heard of more. But he said that a man was as near to heaven on the sea as on the land. That is the spirit which ennobles human nature, and solves all the secrets of the globe.

REVIVAL OF OUR MERCHANT NAVY.

WHEN the war ended the merchant navy of the United States had been so reduced that it might almost have been said to have been crushed out. Of fifteen lines of seagoing steamers plying from New York before the war only three survived: the line to Aspinwall, the line to Portland, Maine, and a feeble line to Havana. Our sailing vessels had been diminished in a mere fraction of the tonnage afloat before the war; in the years 1861, '2, '3, and '4, some 800 American vessels had been transferred to the British flag, and the carrying trade between this country and Europe was wholly in the hands of foreigners, and the trade between this country and China, and this country and South America, very nearly so. Had it not been for the fact that the Government took some 250 vessels, including many of the steamers previously used in our coasting-trade, the war would have ruined the shipping merchants of the country.

With the first dawn of peace individual enterprise began the work of rebuilding our commercial marine. There were still Confederate cruisers in the field when steamers were advertised to leave for Charleston; passenger and freight lines were organized to sail to several rebel ports before the Treasury Department had taken the first step toward relaxing the restrictions upon commerce with the insurgent States. Five months have now elapsed since the war came to an end. For nearly a fortnight trade with the States lately in rebellion has been free. It is instructive to note the energies which have been made toward the restoration of our coasting-trade.

Three regular lines of steamers ply between New York and New Orleans; the departures average three a week. Three lines run between New York and Savannah, giving an average of a steamer a day. Only one regular line is advertised to ply between New York and Charleston, but there is a line from Philadelphia, and extra steamers will bring up the average departures from the North to four a week. There are two lines of steamers to Wilmington, two to Norfolk, and one—besides several occasional steamers—to Richmond, Virginia. A new line is advertised to sail to Mobile once a week. To Portland, Maine, there is a steamer almost every day. For Havana three regular lines are advertised, running two steamers a week. One of these lines runs on to Vera Cruz twice a month. The United States and Mail Steamship Company advertise that they will dispatch a monthly steamer for Rio Janeiro, touching at intermediate ports. Boston is establishing a line to New Orleans, another to Havana, and a third to Mobile. Altogether, it may safely be said that the coast service on the Atlantic is as active as is well consistent, and as it was before the war.

To California we have two steamers a month, as we had during, and occasionally before, the war. But the steamship line on the Atlantic has within a few days passed into the hands of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; and it is understood that within a short time three if not four steamers will be dispatched monthly from New York to Aspinwall. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company has increased its capital stock to eight millions, and it is now after the Cunard Company, the greatest steamship corporation in the world. It proposes to run three or four steamers a month from New York to Aspinwall; a like number from Panama to San Francisco; one steamer a month from San Francisco to British Columbia; and one from San Francisco to Shanghai in China. The local trade of the towns on the Pacific Coast of South America is drained by steamers owned by Henry Meiggs Hallowell, in one or two vessels should be needed for the Pacific Coast, between Panama and Lower California, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company will be ready to supply them. Its fleet at present is as follows:

No serious steps have yet been taken to restore to the American flag its proper share of the traffic between the United States and England. But whatever has been advertised for the Liarys to sail for England, but there is no assurance that she will be the pioneer of a substantial revival. Of the fifteen or six steamers which New York every week for Liverpool, London, Bremen, and Hamburg—giving an average of one vessel a day. Of sailing vessels few are dispatched abroad. The English have four regular lines, besides transient ships; there is a regular line from Hamburg, one from Bremen, and a French line from Havre. No attempt has yet been made to resuscitate any of the old American lines.

The field has not been neglected, however, by American ship-owners. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company stand ready to put on a line to Liverpool, if any see their way clear. The Leaves still have a few of their ancient vessels and see a fair chance of business. Two steamers are being built for a Boston and Liverpool line. And the stockholders in the old Southampton and Havre line are anxious to re-establish it on a new basis. All these parties are, however, looking to Congress, and will not move for a subvention for carrying the mails, and until they become convinced that there is nothing to be derived from this source, it will be idle to expect them to do what they thought toward regaining our share of the carrying trade between the United States and Europe. Sooner or later they will understand that the United States can not afford to pay subventions to ocean steamships for carrying mails across the Atlantic, and when even if it could be afforded, the principle is now so generally understood to be false that the money would not be voted. All the misfortunes of the Collins Company may be traced to reliance on subsidies from Government, and to the wasteful-ness and corruption which they involved. If our ship-owners can not compete with CUNARD and INMAN without help from the United States Government, the carrying trade had better be abandoned to the British. But as soon as the fatal notion of Government aid is eradicated from their minds, we rely on seeing one or more American steamship lines to Liverpool, which will do credit to the country.

Let no man despair of our regaining our supremacy on the sea. The demand for steam ships is more active than it ever was. As a general rule, if Government is selling its battered old transports and steamers at far better prices than was expected; in some cases the vessels sell for more than Government paid for them. Ship-builders are busy in every direction—though the high rates of wages operate to their disadvantage; the chances are that more ocean steamers will be launched in 1866 than in any previous year in our history.

MOSES AND JOHN TYLER.

MANY of the Democratic managers are making the most elaborate efforts to allure the President from the party which elected him, which has steadily supported him, and which has shown its undiminished unity and power in the Autumn elections. They hope to accomplish this result by approving what they suppose to be his policy, absolutely and without criticism. They call for the ingulfing resolutions, they forget that the approval of the President by the Democratic Conventions elsewhere than in New York has been very conditional, and by no means in their hearty and wholesale character which is desirable for the success of the plot.

Why the President should suppose that the party which carried on the war, and which is unbroken, should be unable to complete its work the Democratic doctors do not say. Why ANDREW JOHNSON should imagine that the builders of the Chicago platform share his earnest convictions upon the questions arising from the war, in which he was so conspicuous a figure, and was so heartily denounced by those architects, they also fail to inform us. And why a southern statesman of the United States, with his eyes open, should be expected deliberately to walk into the position which JOHN TYLER alone occupies in the history of the United States, they also discreetly refrain from saying. JOHN TYLER was a Whig who ratted to the Democrats upon becoming President, and was a man respected by them as long as he deserted. What public career in this country was more pitiable than his? What other public career has ever passed into a word expressing so weak and abortive an act? JOHN TYLER "tylerized" to secure a second term. He lost the second term, and gained universal derision. Mr. JOHNSON is not an old man, but he is quite old enough to remember vividly the public career of JOHN TYLER.

The ultimate which the Democratic party contemplates is with their ancient friends in the late rebel States. They were formerly also the political friends of the President. But he parted with them in the winter of 1860-61. He expressed his views of what their fate should be both in the Senate at that time and in the White House in the spring of 1865. He proposes to them that if they will abolish slavery they may present amended State Constitutions for the consideration of Congress. But that Congress objects to any of them because of their not being truly republican and as holding the seeds of infinite future trouble, do the Democratic doctors say that the President is going with WADE HAMPTON and HORATIO SEYMOUR against Congress and the great body of loyal citizens who saved the war, and, in the end, and who stand together to secure the results of the war? Even if, as some Democratic organs have stated before beginning to praise him, the President is anxious for a second term, is he likely to see his way to it more clearly under the auspices of the residuary legatees of the Chicago platform and of the Rebellion than under those of the great national party with which he has fought the good fight, and is still fighting it?

ANDREW JOHNSON told the colored men of Tennessee that he would be their MOSES. Events have made him the MOSES of the whole country. We doubt if he will desert that part for the rôle of JOHN TYLER.

RATS.

Now that the State Conventions are over it is time to think of city government, and to consider who shall be Mayor. Perhaps we have had enough of MAYOR GUNTHER. Possibly the city is not using up its mind but how the taxes steadily increase without the least benefit to any body but corrupt agents. But whether it has or not, the honest men of New York, and they are more than ten, ought to select an honest, competent candidate to vote for, and he, being found, ought to consent to stand.

Nothing seems to be clearer than that if you plant thistle you will not reap wheat. And if you make dishonest or weak men governors you will have a corrupt or feeble government. If there were any doubt of this rather evident truth the recent civic history of New York would supply the proof. The city is a by-word and a wonder to the country. Why not give the country a surprise by electing an able, honorable, and efficient citizen for Mayor?

If there were a New Yorker of the highest character, of proved executive ability, of conspicuous and honorable patriotism, of much and varied experience in public affairs, of great personal popularity, and acceptable to honest men of all parties, ought he not to be nominated for Mayor, and ought he not to be urged to accept the nomination? And if there are many such, ought not each one of them to be willing to make the sacrifice?

It is folly to say that a decent man can not be elected. The result of such an experiment as we suggest could not be foretold. It must be tried. A mere nomination of the kind, or of a good-natured nobody does not put us to the proof. Such a nomination makes every voter listless, and the election goes by default. Nobody in London expects that SIR SAMUEL MILLS could be elected to Parliament from Westminster. But the consequence of nominating such a man was to rouse every Tory to action in the district thoroughly, and MR. MILL was elected. Even if you are defeated it is a great satisfaction to vote for a man worthy to be elected magistrate. That alone is a kind of success, for a vote for positive character and ability is a protest against baseness.

This is a question in which the poorest citizen has a vital interest. He may not pay taxes directly, but he does indirectly. High taxes enhance rents and prices. Corruption at the City Hall makes bread and meat dearer to every consumer. In a city like New York economy and honesty in the workers only cheapens the cost of living to every citizen. The rats in the City Hall eat in every body's larder. Let us clear them out.

FROM MEMPHIS.

A CIVILIAN who has peculiar advantages for knowing what the feeling is in Memphis thus describes the feeling in that city. What he says is interesting, because it confirms the almost universal testimony:

"The rebellious spirit of the people here is as bitter and strong as it has been at any time during the last five years. What I hear and see leads me to believe that every one and the rebel debt are not entirely given up. Rebels are thicker here and bolder than they were; one may be worth more some day than at present. I have talked with many of the leading men in Memphis, and if the troops were withdrawn now, in two weeks a North-ern man could not live here with any degree of safety.

"I believe if the rebel States were allowed in the next Congress full representation that, united with the Copperhead party of the North, they could control the national debt. Maybe I am wrong; but if I were a representative from the South I should not feel the voting bu-siness to pay as army for putting me down.

"The disposition of the people here is to make heroes of those who fought and fell in the rebel ranks. Only last Sabbath one Rev. ——, formerly Bishop of the Southern Episcopal Church, delivered a discourse in honor of the Confederate dead. The Masonic purpose to build in Memphis a splendid church which shall stand as an enduring posterity the names of the 'heroes who fell in a noble cause.' Some thousand five hundred dollars were pledged in two days for this cathedral.

"Peace is the word in the mouth of each these men what treason is, and the punishment due traitors?

"It is common talk among officers here that the war ended too soon. Another general officer says that no policy is adopted by Congress in dealing with unrepentant rebels good and haughty rebels.

"I sincerely hope you will continue to advocate the principle you have so manfully maintained, and not let any one of the heart-felt gratitude of every true soldier in our army."

CAN IT BE TRUE?

THE following is the lofty view of the situation taken by General MORGAN, VALLANDIGHAM's candidate for Governor of Ohio, in his speech at the Convention that nominated him. General MORGAN would have saved Mrs. Grundy:

"CAN it be true that the people of Ohio desire the extermination of our countrymen of the South, and that the black man's home shall be built upon the white man's grave? Forbid it, Heaven! Forbid it, humanity! Forbid it, honor! Forbid it, the name of our country, in the name of civil liberty, in the name of all we hold most dear, and in the name of the Author of the mighty deed—of WASHINGTON and ADAMS, of FRANKLIN and of JEFFERSON, and of HANCOCK and of MADISON—forbid the horrid profanation against humanity, against the Constitution, against the divine spirit of Christianity itself!"

TO BE CALLED FOR, WHEN WANTED.

A DEMOCRATIC paper in Wisconsin says, with exquisite humor: "The great Democratic party of this country stands ready to continue that service which it has so faithfully rendered in the past."

A VIRTUOUS IF.

A WESTERN Democratic editor asks, as if his conscience pricked him, "And if, through the war, the great Democratic party of the country were killed of performing its duty, it is as ready to perform its whole duty now."

☞ MR. STEPHEN MASSETT (Jeames Pipes of Dipesville) has been giving his serio-comic lecture through the State of New York most successfully. He is now on his way to Chicago, there to Minnesota. The Press throughout the country speak very highly of his entertainment.

HALTING.

SIR, you speak wisely; I admit
That Peace is blessed, that War is awful,
And that (if we nobly compass it)
The gain of Concordance is fair and lawful.
I grant that sickles and pruning-hooks
Are better than swords or battle-axes;
That wine and honey, and Art and books,
Fail of the sting of debts and taxes.

But still (if now mark me) it shall chance
That we have trafficked our splendid Anger
For only a lean inheritance
Of surrender and halting toward Ingonor—
Why, then, I say that I think 'twere well
If the mute lips of our armies were not ever:
For the Lord made Men to conquer Hell,
And not to fatten, like kine, in clover.

If the Thrift you speak of, the Peace you laud,
The tripled gains you count in your pocket—
Clear dazzling to the Truth of God,
Strike down the jeering lips that mock it—
If they will but atone from the living tombs
In which the brothers of Christ are trampled,
And crown their contrabrand martyrdoms
With such true crowning as He exampled!

If your loud praises o'er plotless guns
Mean also Glory unto the Father,
So that wherever our bodies runs
Justice and Mercy run together—
Why, then, I answer this every song:
You sing to the sweet Peace breaking o'er us,
Having first paid to Her her due along
The added burden of my weak chorus.

Than this, no further: I am afeared.
I see an Infinite Spiritual Waiting;
I see an Infinite Love reared—
I see a People hesitating,
Between a narrowing bibliolatry,
And a yet wider Pharisaic sophize portals;
Between low pacts that are crammed with death,
And a covenant with the Immortals.

For God's dread tongues of terrible fire,
Eating the Lie with a hunger like unto Hell,
And cast us prone in the hungry mire,
Acabolo with agony—what requitals?
Behold! in the Spiritual grain
The Master standeth—the hour is going:
We look with straight, incredulous eyes:
Our fields lay ripe—but the cock is crowing.

Cretes, our creditors need their dues:
But also the Heavens will have just payment:
If they arraign us, I think we lose.
All—and not merely the Right and raiment.
It hurts (does it not?) when the flaming knives
Of a mad assassin bow and stab us!
Life—God's life—is worth more than lives.
Shall we send the NAZARENE—or Barabbas?

RICHARD REALF.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE "ALGONQUIN" AND "WINNEBAGO."

AT ten o'clock A. M. on Friday, September 22, the trial of the double-turreted monitors, the "Algonquin" and "Winnebago," took place at sea. The weather was fine, and after five hours' steaming from the Navy Yard the two were ready for the commencement of the trial. The "Algonquin" was to be the first to be driven to her utmost speed, and to be kept at the highest rate of speed for four hours. The "Winnebago" was to be driven 16 hours. The "Algonquin" was to make 1600 pounds of coal were to be given to the engineer and the same amount weighed out for the Winnebago, and both vessels were to make 10 revolutions per minute. The engineer of the Algonquin said during the trial average the same number of revolutions as the Winnebago, and with a less amount of coal, than what she left on the wharf was to be weighed, and would be found to have consumed 2500 pounds. The more coal was needed to keep up 10 revolutions per minute the better for the vessel.

At the commencement of the preliminary trial the Algonquin left the wharf at the Navy Yard, and immediately in the water in her bellows. The Winnebago began by pulling 11 1/2 revolutions per minute under 1600 pounds of coal; the Algonquin with the same amount of wood, but 2000 pounds of coal. In a short time the Winnebago began to "revolve" with a steam pressure of 23 pounds, having already had in the bellows 1600 pounds of coal. It was settled upon that the Winnebago began to make steam, though 1600 pounds of coal, 2000 pounds of coal, the same as the Algonquin. She began to "revolve" at 12.38 with a steam pressure of 20 pounds, at one o'clock she Algonquin was making 14 revolutions and the Winnebago 12. At 2.50 the Algonquin made 15 revolutions and the Winnebago 13 1/2 pounds and a consumption per hour of 1500 pounds of coal. The Algonquin made 15 revolutions; steam 30 pounds; consumption of coal 1100 pounds per hour. The Winnebago 13 1/2 revolutions.

In another hour the 16 hours' trial commenced. Up to two hours after the trial began the 1600 revolutions made. At 4 o'clock P.M. on Sunday the Algonquin was 140 revolutions, 1600 pounds of coal—2500 pounds of coal. Steam, besides having saved nearly 3 tons of the amount of coal allowed, 2500 pounds. The Winnebago rapidly gaining.

At 11 P.M. on Sunday the Algonquin's fuel-pipe failed, owing, Mr. Dickerson says, to the too sudden closing of the steam-valve by the engineer. When this occurred the Algonquin had to her credit 2500 pounds of coal. Mr. Dickerson claims that if the trial had been 24 hours in favor of his vessel. But in estimating the result on most favorable terms the Algonquin had to her credit 2500 pounds of coal, which would be equal to 2500 tons for 24 hours. The Algonquin made 2500 revolutions, and consumed only 900 pounds less than the Winnebago, which made 1600 revolutions more than the former, and 1600 pounds more than the Algonquin, allowing 14 revolutions per minute, which was the average number made by the Winnebago, would require 25 minutes and 30 seconds; while the amount of coal saved in favor of the Algonquin, allowing the same a consumption of 1800 pounds per hour—represent 37 minutes and 45 seconds. That is, the Algonquin would have made 2500 revolutions in time, amounts to 14 minutes and 45 seconds; the vessel had been running 16 hours, and the Algonquin's advantage distributed over the time would be 6, or less than 1 at a second per minute. But the chief consideration involved in the estimate is that the Algonquin passed this significant advantage by sacrificing her machinery, while the Winnebago could probably have been able to more than balance the account against her, without the slightest risk, by increasing the injury to the Algonquin's machinery in her fuel-pipe, and did not, as was apprehended, take the latter on an express.

In a letter published September 27 Mr. Dickerson claims that instead of the Winnebago being ahead of everything the Algonquin was ahead 26, when the latter broke down. In this case she would have gone on for nine days, and if Congress had an advantage of nearly three quarters of an hour, or, when distributed over 24 hours, of nearly one second per minute.

THE SYRACUSE CONVENTION.

The Union State Convention met at Syracuse September 26. There was no evidence of factious disorganization apparent, as the World hoped there might be. Mr. Charles J. Folger was chosen temporary Chairman. Before taking his seat he made a speech in which he said that the Union party was not a party of words but of deeds and ideas. He contended the issue of that party with the enemy of the Democratic party. Chauncey M. Depew was then made President of the Convention. He also made a speech very similar in its general tone to that of Folger.

General Francis Kernan was chosen as candidate for Secretary of State; Thomas H. Hubbard for Controller; Colonel Rockwell Graves, Treasurer; General C. M. Reynolds for Attorney-General; Mr. J. F. Goodell for State Engineer and Surveyor; General Benjamin Wood for Canal Appraiser; and Henry Jones for Clerk of the Court of Appeals.

The resolutions adopted were such as would be assumed to be very nearly satisfactory to the Union party. Much attention was made of the policy of negro suffrage. President Johnson's policy is heartily indorsed.

THE ALABAMA CONVENTION.

The Alabama Convention has submitted the Provisional Governor's proposal to an election for members of Congress, to take place on the first Monday in November. The Convention has also, at the suggestion of Governor Parsons, passed resolutions requesting the President to pardon all persons who have applied for pardon, and who are not disqualified by the fourteenth article of the Constitutional Amendment. The Convention has also passed an ordinance of secession null and void. The Mississippi Convention has taken the same course; but that South Carolina thought it necessary to repeal the secession ordinance. The Alabama Convention has also passed an ordinance repudiating the debts of slavery. Another ordinance prevents negroes to hold property and to testify in courts.

BY a whaling vessel arrived at New London from the Arctic Ocean, the Journal of Commerce learns from Captain G. H. Hall, the explorer, who left the United States in 1864, under the patronage of Henry Grinnell, Esq., of this city. Mr. Hall's letters were expressed 150 miles over the ice by dog-sledges to some whaler. He writes in good spirits, having obtained much valuable information with regard to the Esquimaux. Captain Hall expects to spend most of his time in King William's Land and the Fox Land Peninsula, and he says that a vessel should be sent in the spring of 1867 to bring him home. Captain Hall's party consists of 19 persons, 15 Esquimaux, two half-breed interpreters who accompany Mr. Hall in his wanderings, and the remainder to clear the ship and navigate her in the Spring. Mr. Hall's letter is dated Fort Hooper, on the coast of Boothia, Lat. 70, Long. 94 W.

A letter written by President Lincoln to the family of General Wallbridge, after the latter's decease, has been published. In this letter President Lincoln declared his intention to make negro suffrage in the South a condition precedent to their reconstruction.

The casualties in the campaign of General Grant's army from May 5 to November 1, this year, were 57,225, which 30,296 were killed, 33,097 were wounded, and 23,833 were missing. The first week of the campaign in the battles of the Wilderness the casualties were 17,666; at Spottsylvania, including the battles from the 12 to May 21, the casualties were 18,399; at Cold Harbor, from June 1 to 13, 12,737; before Petersburg, 7,423.

In the Atlanta campaign General Sherman lost 27,199 men, of which 4,423 were missing. Of 13,000 men of the Potomac he a net-off of 10,570 prisoners, captured from the enemy. At the same time army lost 16 guns captured 32. The Grand Army of the Mississippi captured 10,000 men in an aggregate of 15,000 prisoners and deserters during the active operations ending with the fall of Atlanta, of which only 4,423 were missing, which aggregate the remarkably small number of only 620 died from various diseases. Of artillery ammunition the Armies of the Cumberland, Tennessee, and Ohio expended together 4,000 rounds of shot, shell, and ammunition, 27,187,132 rounds.

In the case of Fort Smith, Arkansas, seventy-five loyal and seventy-four disloyal Indian delegates, not including Creek Chiefs, signed the treaty of peace with the Government Commissioners up to September 21. The Creek Chiefs and Delawares signed it October 14, and the council was finally closed.

Reports have been received from General Conner that he attacked and defeated the Indians on the Powder River Big Horn on the 30th of August, capturing five hundred ponies and killing a large amount of Indians. He was in number killed and wounded, among them several officers. Subsequently to the fight Conner was in receipt of reports from Colonel Cole, commanding the right column of General Connor's command against the hostile Indians of the Northwest. His troops had engagements on the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th September, in which more than 60 were killed, estimated at over three thousand, of the Sioux, Cheyenne, and Arapahoe tribes, who, in the several actions were defeated, scattered, and driven with great slaughter, leaving their dead on the ground. Our troops had 15 men killed and wounded, included in which were many of their best officers. The Indians estimated at 3,000 warriors, their total loss was seven killed and three wounded.

The Hon. WILLIAM L. SHARKEY, the provisional Governor of Mississippi, has resigned.

The Wisconsin Democratic State Convention met September 28, and made the following nominations: For Governor, Lucius Fairchild; Lieutenant-Governor, D. W. Jones; Treasury General, General M. Montgomery; Secretary of State, T. B. Vilas; Treasurer, J. A. Adams. The resolutions adopted indorse President Johnson's policy and denounce the Union on the basis of the Federal Constitution as the only basis of reconstruction, and oppose negro suffrage in the State of Wisconsin or interference with it by Congress. They oppose the extension of the Asbury express, favor the most rigid economy in the expenses of the Government, and direct equalization of the tax burdens.

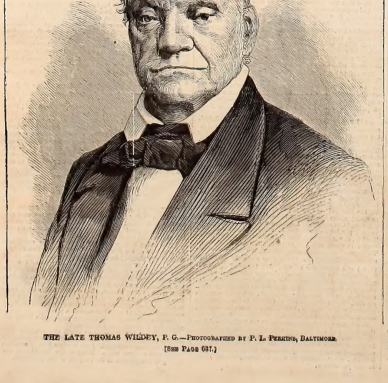
GENERAL H. W. SLOCUM.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

GENERAL FRANCIS C. BARLOW.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

GENERAL H. W. SLOCUM.

MAJOR-GENERAL HENRY WARREN SLOCUM, the Democratic candidate for Secretary of State, was born at Delhi, New York, September 24, 1827, and is now thirty-eight years of age. He graduated at West Point in 1852, and his first military service was in Florida. In 1857, after having been promoted to a lieutenancy, he resigned his profession for the practice of law.



He was recalled to military life by the breaking out of the rebellion. He re-entered the service as Colonel of the Twenty-Seventh New York Volunteers. This regiment left Elmira, one thousand strong, for Washington July 10, 1861. In the subsequent month he, at the same time with Colonel BUENER, was appointed Brigadier-General. His command was the Third Brigade of the First Division of the First Army Corps, then under M'DOWELL, until April, 1862, when he was placed in command of his division, which he led during the Peninsular campaign with great credit. For some time he held the advance of the extreme right of General M'CLELLAN'S army. About the middle of June he occupied the Virginia Central Railroad bridge across the Chickahominy, a position which brought him into the early part of the seven days' battles, especially that of Gaines's Mills. At the battle of Antietam, in September, 1862, he commanded the First Division in FRANKLIN'S wing.

General SLOCUM, upon the organization of the Twelfth Corps, was made its commander, having been promoted to the rank of a Major-General by a commission dated July 4, 1862. During the battle of Fredericksburg this corps formed half of the reserve grand division under SIGEL, and therefore did not participate in that struggle. In the advance upon Chancellorsville under HOOKER, in 1863, General SLOCUM held command of the right wing of the army, consisting of three corps; though upon the arrival of HOOKER upon the field he returned to his corps with which he fought during those memorable first three days of May, and, though a young officer, evinced a degree of military skill rarely surpassed by much older generals.

When it became necessary to send troops to the relief of ROSECRANS at Chattanooga SLOCUM was sent westward with the Twelfth Corps. He engaged in the battles of Lookout Valley and Lookout Mountain. April 4, 1864, when HOOKER'S two corps were consolidated into a single corps, under the leadership of "Fighting Joe" himself, SLOCUM was relieved and sent to Vicksburg. It was natural when HOOKER resigned the command of the Twentieth Corps, in the summer of 1864, that SLOCUM should succeed him.

General SLOCUM'S more recent service as commander of the left wing in SHERMAN'S memorable march through Georgia and the Carolinas is too familiar to all of our readers to need recapitulation. Upon the surrender of JOHNSTON General SLOCUM was assigned to his former post at Vicksburg, where the New York Democratic nomination found him.

The Democratic party in this State could have chosen no more available candidate than General SLOCUM, whose uprightness and honesty are beyond question, and whose patriotism has come out of the furnace-heat of a four years' war as bright and unsullied as the stars of the flag he fought for. We have no doubt that General SLOCUM, as well as General BARLOW, despises the Chicago Platform adopted by the Democrats last year.

GENERAL BARLOW.

MAJOR-GENERAL FRANCIS C. BARLOW, the Union candidate for Secretary of State in New York, is one of the most heroic and skillful of our soldiers. One of his achievements, the capture of a whole rebel division with its Generals at Spottsylvania, was perhaps the most brilliant single feat of the war. Enlisting as a private in a New York regiment upon the fall of Sumter, his high capacity, dauntless courage, and loyal devotion, carried him rapidly from the ranks to a Colonelcy. At Fair Oaks his regiment, the New York Sixty-first, was nobly conspicuous. At Antietam he captured two stands of colors and three hundred prisoners, and, leading in the hottest fire, was fearfully wounded and left for dead upon the field.

Promoted a Brigadier his recovery from apparently hopeless injuries enabled him to take part in the great day of Gettysburg, when he was again so severely wounded that he fell into the hands of the enemy, but seemed so nearly dead that they left him, and he was recaptured by our flag. By the most unremitting and tender care once more able to join the army, he commanded the first division of HANCOCK'S Second Corps when the final campaign in Virginia opened. The army moved on the 3d of May, and forced its bloody way through the Wilderness. On the 12th, at the earliest dawn, BARLOW'S Division at the head of the assaulting column broke over the rebel works, and, clubbing muskets, captured three thousand prisoners, an entire division, with Major-General EDWARD JOHNSON and Brigadier STUART. Pushing on with his division, and fortunately unhurt, he was actively engaged in the field when the sad news of his wife's death reached him—a wife worthy of a soldier.

Married upon the eve of his departure for the war, his wife shared his fortunes, and with a zeal like that of her husband in the field, this accomplished and admirable woman devoted herself to the care of the sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals. Her duties were most arduous; her devotion unwearied; and stricken at last by mortal illness in the Fredericksburg hospital, she died, refusing to allow her husband to know of her peril until it was too late.

During the final campaign, at the instance of General GRANT, the Brigadier was made a Major-General, and emerged untouched, save by the prostration of illness.

Young, accomplished, experienced, of tried ability, and utterly free from personal and partisan cliques and intrigues, General BARLOW fitly heads the ticket of the great body of honest men of New York who will have no terms with any kind of rebellion, and whose hearts beat in unison with his own for that Union and Liberty for which he has so bravely fought and so cruelly suffered.

GENERAL SCHIMMELPFENNIG.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL ALEXANDER SCHIMMELPFENNIG, whose portrait we give on this page, died on the 7th of September, 1865, at Wernersville, near Reading (Berks County), Pennsylvania, after a long illness, contracted in part, it is believed, by severe service in the army. His full and correct name was ALEXANDER SCHIMMELPFENNIG VON DER OYE. Belonging to an old aristocratic family in Prussia, he entered the army of that country early, after having received a careful military education; but his liberal and democratic spirit did not permit him to stay there.

THE LATE BRIGADIER-GENERAL ALEXANDER SCHIMMELPFENNIG.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

In the revolution of 1848-49 he sided with the people, and took up arms against this very army when it invaded the Palatinate in 1849. He was compelled to leave his country, and went, after some stay in Switzerland, to London, where he commenced, in common with a number of his countrymen, an active and earnest agitation for the supremacy of the same liberal ideas for which he had taken up arms before. A short time was sufficient to show him the fruitlessness of these efforts at that time and in that place, and he came to this country (1853) to find here a new home.

He first lived in Philadelphia, and afterward in Washington, always watching with keen eye the chances of freedom, and ready to support it where and when he could. The days following the attack on Fort Sumter found him ready and willing. Communication was then destroyed between the national capital and the loyal North. ALEXANDER SCHIMMELPFENNIG set out on foot to reach Pennsylvania, where he intended to offer his military services. The rebel Marylanders turned him back, but, undaunted by the bullets fired at him, he set out a second time, and then, under the disguise of a surveyor, and having passed an examination as such by some rebel officer, he actually reached Pennsylvania, and commenced the formation of a regiment. Sickness (small-pox) delayed his plans for some months; but soon we find him on the field at the head of the Seventy-fourth Pennsylvania regiment, and taking part in the campaign in West Virginia under Fremont. He soon received the command of a brigade, and did great service in the second Bull Run battle. After the battle of Gettysburg SCHIMMELPFENNIG was at the head of a division to join our forces before Charleston, South Carolina; and there, in a more independent position, he showed the intrepidity of a true soldier. As a reward he had the honor to enter Charleston first; but his health was gone almost entirely, and it was only the indomitable spirit of duty and the enthusiasm for the cause that made him stay when it was almost a physical impossibility to do so. At last he broke down entirely, and breathed his last after having seen the Union restored and freedom triumphant, not, as he might justly think, without his share in the action of the nation.

THE NATIONAL HORSE FAIR IN ILLINOIS.

WE give on this page an illustration of the National Horse Fair, recently held in Springfield, Illinois. The affair created a great sensation in the State, and not less than ten thousand persons were present to witness the races on September 23. The race-track had been prepared with great care; the whole surface, not varying six feet from a common level, had been swept and rolled until the crust was hardened and smooth, ringing out from under the tread of the horses with that clear, full sound turfmen like so well to hear.

The stands for judges and reporters were situated upon the north side of the grounds, and opposite them a long amphitheatre had been erected capable of seating not less than 4000 persons. Added to this numerous tents had been reared, within the canvas walls of which itinerant showmen exhibited fat men and women, snakes, crocodiles, and curiosities of a similar nature.

General JOHN A. M'CLERNAND and Brigadier-General COOK, who command the military district in which the fair was held, were present; and Genenl GRANT and Staff, with Governor OGLESBY, were expected to be present at the ladies' equestrian display on the 26th. A large number of those in attendance were ladies, and certainly they displayed as keen an appreciation of the proceedings as the sterner sex, if they were less demonstrative than the latter.

All the animals were fine specimens of thoroughbred horses, their pedigrees, as gleaned from the "Jockey Register" and produced by their owners, showing some of the best blood upon either side of the Atlantic. All were from stock well known in the records of the turf, and the fine appearance of the animals themselves elicited universal commendation. The races were exciting, and altogether the fair could scarcely be rivaled either as regards interest or for the excellence of the horses exhibited.

ANNUAL FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE.

THE Thirty-sixth Annual Fair of the American Institute, which we illustrate on page 632, was opened on the evening of September 12. The Fair was held in the spacious and elegant Third Avenue Second Regiment, in Fourteenth Street, which was used by the Institute for the display of the various specimens of Arts and Manufactures which have been contributed from all parts of the several States.

The largest of the four rooms devoted to the purpose is 130 feet square, and on the evening of the 12th was filled with the most anomalous collection of articles. Stationary and stereoscopic views, and sewing machines, iron bedsteads and soda-water fountains, millinery and machinery, all were jumbled together in the most inextricable confusion. This may be accounted for by the short time the exhibition has been in preparation. The main room was handsomely decorated with the flags of all nations. In the gallery devoted to the Fine Arts a large number of admirably executed photographs adorned the walls, and there were besides many beautiful specimens of statuary and work in bas-relief. The mechanical department exhibited speak well for the skill and intelligence of our people.

On the occasion of opening the Fair Major-General Dix delivered an eloquent and appropriate address, dwelling upon the recent improvements in the arts, and alluding especially to the improvement lately made in the engineer of war.

WHY I NEVER MARRIED

A BACHELOR! An old bachelor! Yes, that's what I am, and what I intend to remain! With a pinion of gray, and those of you who know me have been ensnared into matrimony; there's no help for a man after he has once put the ring on the finger of the creature who has beguiled him into coming up upon her his name and worldly goods—the last item of great consequence in her estimation, doubtless. I'll escape for him yet. Ah, that's the only thing he can do is to make the best of his bargain, and try to hide from every one the mistake he has made.

Talk of domestic happiness—mutual love and confidence—and peace, one mind, one heart, all that all gammon and moonshine! I don't believe in any thing of the kind now—I did once—more fool I—I took every thing for granted, and—I'll tell you there was such a thing as deceit in the world. I thought folks said what they meant, and that they were what they seemed to be. Now-a-days one can't a young man from the country," you see. Didn't know that appearances were deceitful. Thought all that glitter was gold—never imagined there could be such a thing as spurious coin. Fancied all women angels, and models of artlessness, beauty, innocence, simplicity, and truthfulness! In consequence of this miserable delusion, I was on the brink of being taken in and done for, a thousand times as if I'd walked into the sea. A narrow escape I had. A cold shudder goes through me when I think about it. I'm not sure more though if it hadn't have happened as so dreadful, what would the reality itself have been? Ugh! What, indeed? Imagination fails me here.

* * * * *

Well, perhaps you'd like to hear all about that narrow escape? Misery therefore, although it is not particularly pleasant to be laughed at, I'll make a martyr of myself for the benefit of mankind in general, and if any young jigger or two is from the book of my past life, as the novelists say.

Old-fashioned folks my parents were; but honorable, open-hearted, and sincere—rare qualities now-a-days—and to my pity. I was an only child, indulged and petted, and idolized to the uttermost, as an only child generally is. I never went to school, but was brought up at home—first by governesses, then by tutors.

The family homestead was in the north of Derry, situation beautiful. I had barely completed my eighteenth lived two miles away; society in the north of Derry was very limited, like some of the library companies.

My progenitors rolled in riches, as the saying is. Of course, under these circumstances, there was no occasion for me to earn my living. I was averse to study; and, as my will was my law, my education was one of the most superficial kind, in spite of numerous preceptors. I preferred rambling about out of doors to strict attention to my studies indoors.

At the age of twenty I was quite a specimen of fashion; its customs and requirements, as well as its arts and deceits, were a sealed book to me; my ideas were extremely vague on all subjects, except those closely connected with home.

People say "Ignorance is bliss," but there is no rule without an exception. The consequences of my ignorance would have been any thing but bliss if I had not been for—But I must ask your pardon.

My twenty-first birthday arrived—I was a man! A very handsome fellow, my friends said. I'd describe my personal appearance, and leave you to judge for yourself, reader, whether they spoke the truth or not.

Six feet one I stood in my stockings; well-made figure, curly brown hair, ditto whiskers, brown eyes, white forehead, white teeth. Sweet smile (so my mother said), musical voice (so my aunt said), uncommon good abilities, but rather idle (so said my tutors and governesses). Add to these characteristics a well-filled purse, a brazen-eye pretensions, a large trunk in a lady-like wrapper, a new suit of clothes, a shining beaver-hat, an umbrella of large dimensions, and you will have a pretty accurately correct idea of your humble servant, as, for the first time in his life, he left his home alone, in order to pay a visit to his aunt and uncle, who resided at the fashionable watering-place, Gayton by name.

* * * * *

"Adolphus, my boy, are you suddenly turned into stone? I have been watching you for some time, and you haven't moved an inch." Who is it that you are staring at so intently?

Thus said my cousin Dick, and his speech was accompanied by a hearty slap on the back—a decisive of good-will, doubtless—but unpleasant nevertheless.

"What was I staring at? Ah, what indeed? Opposite me was a lovely girl, who had probably unmarked about twenty summers; her waving hair was of a rich golden hue, on large curls floated over her alabaster shoulders, her complexion was a most charming mixture of roses and lilies, her teeth were dazzlingly white, her eyes large, dark, and expressive, her large blue eyes sparkled like diamonds under her well-pencilled eyebrows, jewels were glittering in her easy clouds of floating white lace enveloped her fairy figure. I gazed at her like one in a trance; every feature of her face, every movement; I was bewitched, fascinated, enchanted; and, oh! wonder of all wonders, happiness beyond expression, that overwhelming expression of which I have returned my modest gaze with shy yet not displeased looks!

The first glance of those beaming eyes caused an indescribable thrill to pass through my frame; the second caused my heart to flee away and seek for refuge in her bosom.

Dick's rough salutation roused me. I started violently, and stared vacantly at his round, good-natured face.

"What's the matter?" he said, laughing; "you're not ill, are you?"

"Ill? No—no, I don't think so. I feel rather queer, but I'm not ill. Tell me, there's a good fellow, who it is that I've been staring at?"

"Her! What 'her' do you mean?" asked Dick, in total defiance of Lindley Murray. "What an oddity you are, Adolphus! Why, you haven't met a sea-nymph, or a fairy? Which is the young woman, eh?"

"Young woman!" I repeated, indignantly, "she's a perfect angel!"

"I don't doubt it," replied Dick, laughing more heartily, at my evident vexation, "she's the most beautiful girl I ever saw, and such a complexion! Do you know her, Dick? Oh, Dick, do you know her?"

He glanced in the direction indicated by an extraordinary expression came over his face; half sneer, half laugh.

"Know her? Esther, just a bottle; yes, I know her," was the reply, and, to my intense annoyance, he laughed again.

"What can be laughing at?

Hitherto I had considered my cousin an agreeable, sensible fellow enough, but now I set him down as inane a mistake; it was most unkind of him to laugh when he must see I was in earnest; it was too bad, a great deal too bad!

I frowned angrily, and exclaimed,

"I don't see any thing to laugh at; if you don't mean to introduce me, why don't you say so at once?"

"My dear fellow, don't be cross; I'll introduce you with the greatest pleasure in life," Dick replied, briskly. "Come with me; her name is Seraphina Stubbles; propitious that, isn't it?"

So saying, my cousin took me by the arm, and hurried me across the room, and without giving me time to collect my scattered senses, he strode toward the object of my admiration, who was now standing by the side of an elderly lady.

"Mrs. Stubbles, I have the honor me to introduce my cousin to your daughter?" said Richard, bowing low.

The elderly lady smiled blandly, and replied, graciously.

"My darling child will be delighted to make the acquaintance of your cousin. Phina, love, you will feel equal to dancing any more? She is so delicate, she is the first one of the season she is not able to dance many times, poor little thing!"

This last remark was made in an audible whisper, and was accompanied by a look of tender solicitude full of tenderness at the lovely Seraphina, who now stood smiling pallidly by my side. My introduction to her took place, but, thought she could dance once more, she said, as her mother anxiously cautioned her not to tire herself. Oh, how my heart beat as she placed her little hand on my arm! Oh, happiness beyond expression when it fell to my lot to lead her to the top of the room, and to support her graceful form in the first waltz!

For some time I could not speak. I was so intoxicated with delight that I could scarcely take breath; and the unusual exercise caused the floor of the room to fee as if it were giving way beneath me. For hour I felt just inclined to be sick, and entered into conversation with her.

My infatuation rapidly increased; she appeared to grow more bewitching every moment. Oh, what a sweet smile she had! What a lovely complexion! My pink and white, and so transparent that I could trace the delicate blue veins beneath it!

She was not displeased by the admiration which my words and looks expressed. She looked down on her shy yet encouraging glances made me half wild with joy. I scarcely quitted her side that evening. I led her down to supper; mine was the privileged hand which threw a warm shawl over her shoulders, and which assisted her into the carriage.

"Permit me to call on you tomorrow, Miss Stubbles," I entreated, as I pressed the fingers which rested so confidingly in mine; "what time may I have the honor?"

One moment of dreadful suspense, and my agitated heart was reassured by the words, "I shall be at home at half-past three."

* * * * *

A small but luxuriously-furnished drawing-room with rose-colored chairs and couches; rose-colored blinds, hair-drawn, causing a charmingly-subdued light; mirrors on all sides; elegant vases filled with rare exotics which perfumed the atmosphere; glittering chandeliers; soft Turkey carpet: such was the fairy-like apartment into which I was ushered by a page the next afternoon.

Reclining on a velvet couch in a corner of the room where the light was the most subdued was my enchantress, Seraphina Stubbles, attired in a blue muslin dress with rich trimmings of lace. A tiny pink chipper peeped from beneath the multitudinous folds of her dress; her hair appeared to be more golden, more wavy, more abundant than on the previous evening; and yet more bewitchingly beautiful was the mixture of roses and lilies which bloomed on her face.

She welcomed me with a smile, and extended her white hand, adorned with glittering jewels.

"So glad to see you, Mr. Adolphus," I returned, "I feared you would come;" and then she cast down her eyes in maidenly confusion at having expressed her feelings so freely.

"Mamma will not be able to see you, I fear," she continued, once more raising her eyes timidly to my face; "she is so fatigued after her late exertions; and I do not feel quite myself to-day; I am not strong," and she bowed a gentle sigh.

How fragile, how delicate she looked as she leaned back on her cushions, and played nervously with her watch-chain! A sudden pang shot through my heart; I had been very inconsiderate, perhaps, in such a sign of weakness; could it be possible that beauty, such as I now beheld, was doomed to fade away in the early grave?

The thought was madness. I shuddered involuntarily.

"Are you cold?" inquired the lovely Seraphina, with a look of interest which thrilled through my frame; "you have not a delicate constitution, I trust?"

"No. Oh no, I am very strong. I am not cold, but only you sit, I was afraid—" And here I came to a full stop; my feelings quite overpowered me, and prevented further utterance.

"Ah! I see," she sighed the gentle creature; "you are very kind, I'm sure; very kind, indeed!" and again the blue eyes drooped beneath my expressive gaze.

I will not dwell longer on that interview; it is sufficient to say that the forenoon of pleasure, nay, ecstasy, a week passed away, and my infatuation increased, if possible, tenfold.

Each day I contrived to come to the point, and to entreat Miss Stubbles to be my wife, but something held me back.

I could not help being rather surprised that my charmer invariably appointed the same hour for me to visit her; that she invariably received me in that rose-colored apartment with the rose-colored blinds half drawn down; that she invariably occupied a couch in that corner of the room where the light was most subdued; that Mrs. Stubbles never seldom made her appearance; but these thoughts did not trouble me long, for, looking at those eyes, I distrusted themselves upon me, and I was as happy as it was possible for a man in love to be, whose passion is undeclared, and who is not sure of success.

My cousin Richard seemed to take the greatest interest in the affair; he no longer laughed when I mentioned Seraphina's name; he listened patiently to my raptures, only advising me not to be in too great a hurry to "pop the question," as he termed the disclosure of my passion. Had I taught a child, determined to bring matters to a crisis. Richard and I were invited to a picnic. Miss Stubbles was invited likewise. As I started to rest the previous night I resolved that the next day should decide my fate—which, by-the-bye, in a very different manner to what I had anticipated.

I shall never forget that picnic! Never!

It took place at Hilthero, a romantic ruin about eight miles from Gayton. 'Twas a lovely day; sun shining, birds singing, company select, dinner just what it ought to be; no unpleasant mixture of sugar and salt, vinegar and cream, no breakings of plates and dishes, no spilling of wine and beer, or any other unpleasantness usually attendant on picnics.

Nothing could have been better arranged; every one was pleased; myself in particular, for never had Seraphina appeared more charming, never had I found her more kind and tender look, gesture, and words of encouragement, as on the present occasion.

A ramble over the ruins was proposed after dinner; for some little time the party kept together, but at length, to my delight, I found myself alone with my enchantress in one of the most secluded parts of the ruined castle. The situation was a most romantic one. Perched at the very summit of what spotted veal fell over her lovely features, shading, but not concealing the transparency of her complexion.

The opportunity I had so long desired had arrived; I must speak, and quickly too, for fear of interruption.

With a great effort I summoned up my courage. I drew nearer my companion, who appeared to be in a state of tremulous excitement.

"Miss Stubbles. Ah! may I call you Seraphina?"

"You may," she faintly murmured, trembling yet more visibly.

I ventured to take her hand, and to press it fondly.

"Seraphina, you must have seen—you must be aware that I love you to distraction, my darling!" The only wonder to me is that you have not already been made a bride."

She shook her head, and raised her eyes to mine with a tender look.

"Adolphus," she whispered, in a voice of inexpressible sweetness (and mixed we had my Christian name sounded so delightfully in my ears), "Adolphus, I must have been lived before—I do not deny it; but oh! how can I say it? I—I—have never returned it till now; forgive me if I have said too much," and she again lowered her head in graceful confusion.

In a moment I was on my knees beside her, and my arm was round her waist.

"Forgive you, my Seraphina? How can I thank you sufficiently for those blessed words? How can I ever repay you?" Oh, Seraphina! Charming Seraphina! from henceforth I will devote my life to assuring you of happiness!" With this arm I will ever protect you; I will ever shield you from every danger that may—"

I could say no more; an exclamation of astonishment and alarm issued from the lips of her whom I adored, a sudden start; a scream, and the next moment my Seraphina was in the arms of—not a fainting lady! As I quickly regained my feet, I fancied I heard a smothered laugh, and I perceived my cousin Richard at a little distance from the spot I had left.

As for my Seraphina, my beloved one, she lay motionless on the turf, her eyes closed, her lip quiet. Alas! alas! she had fainted! With a cry of delight I raised her in my arms, and gazed eagerly at her. Strange to say, although she was insensible, the rosy color had not faded from her cheeks; and, what was stranger still, as I hurriedly removed the hat with its blue feather and white veil from Miss Stubbles's head, the long golden curls I had so admired in all their glory fell down.

Horror, not unmixed with alarm, filled my breast. With dilated eyes I gazed at the shining tresses which lay on the grass by her feet. A loud laugh caused me to look up—Richard stood beside me. Richard convulsed with merriment! In his hand he bore the basket of water which had so lately reflected the sun's rays.

"Look! look!" he cried, as I pointed to the glossy curls which were connected by a narrow band. "Oh, Richard! what does it mean?"

"Mean!" was the reply, accompanied with laughing heartily; "oh, Adolphus! how precious green you are! Lay her down on the grass; I'll show you what it means."

I laid the still insensible Seraphina down as desired; in an instant Richard had unceremoniously removed the remainder of the basket of hair and face; and, after rapidly passing his handkerchief once or twice over her features, he rose up and waved over the head of the lady who, to me, gave signs of recovery.

"Now, my dear fellow, open, old boy!" said my cousin. "This will be a lesson to you to be more wide-awake for the future."

Surprised! I should think so not express my feelings at that dreadful moment!

Where were the roses and lilies which, a minute ago, had bloomed on the cheeks of Miss Stubbles? Where were the well-arched eyebrows? Where the delicate blue veins on the transparent skin? Where the golden tresses of the lovely one? Gone, gone, all gone!

And in the place of the apparently beautiful girl who had so captivated my fancy there now rose from the grass a middle-aged woman, with a sallow face, dripping, streaming with water, and bowed utterly devoid of eyebrows! The only traces that were left of the recent charms of Seraphina Stubbles were the long golden curls in her hand.

Was I dreaming? Had I suddenly lost my senses? Or was the scene on which I gazed a wonderful reality?

For some minutes I was incapable of speech or action; there I stood, motionless as a statue, looking at the creature who, but a few minutes before, me. At length I could no longer control my feelings, and I exclaimed, I stepp'd away from the scene so repulsive and so painful to me!

* * * * *

I was never taken in again in that way, reader. I've seen love again. No more blooming cheeks for me! I had no faith in pure complexions after that dreadful day. Rouge and I became fast friends ever since.

I did not wish you to be regularly sold," said Richard to me when we were told one, on the morning of that picnic, what your intentions were, I resolved to watch you pretty closely. I was himself taken in once very nearly in the same way, and only to that deceitful woman, and it was my sudden appearance which startled her to such an extent that she upset her camp-stool, and tumbled down backwards. But I was too bad of me, I could not resist such a glorious opportunity of showing her to you in her true colors, or rather without any colors at all. Bless you, she's been well known here these ten years; she always tries to beguile strangers, but they find her out sooner or later. She's often called "The Painted Lady," but I don't think she greatly resembles the beautiful butterfly which bears that name."

Just a word or two, by way of warning, to my fashionable young lady readers ere I bring this paper to a conclusion.

When duly armed for conquest, when your hair glistens with the daily advertised "Lucrezian Fluid," when long curls (for which you have paid five shillings each) stream over your shoulders, when your skin is "enamelled," and when false roses and lilies bloom on your cheeks, take care, I say, take care! Beware of camp-stools, steep banks, and thunder-all of water; for sequences may be as disagreeable to you as they were to Miss Seraphina Stubbles!

THE TENNESSEE SERGEANTS.

BY JAMES REDPATH.

SERGEANT REYNOLDS'S STORY.

WHEN I was in Marietta last autumn, waiting for a pass to go to the neighboring town of Atlanta, which Queen Sherman had then under captivity, I made the acquaintance of two sergeants of the Fifth Regiment of Tennessee Infantry Volunteers. Like all the loyalists of East Tennessee and Northern Georgia and Alabama whom I met in that part of the theatre of war, they related many instances of heroic self-sacrifice on the part of their people, which both illustrate the cruelty of the old ruling class and the patriotic spirit which was the cause for their own redemption from the amazing ignorance wherein they have been reared.

I took note—full stenographic notes—of their talk as they spoke to me by their camp-fires. I reproduce them now, not as interesting episodes of war merely, but in the hope that they may aid in arresting that dangerous mania miscalled "magnanimity"—a mania of an ably managed and commercial profit and political plate—which seems to be the prevailing madness of the hour, and which seeks to forget our enemies not before they repent only, but at the price of the sacrifice of "our Southern friends."

Sergeant Reynolds was a fine-looking young man, with clear blue eyes and a frank, manly aspect.

JAMES REVIS'S ARREST.

"In the fall of 1861," said the Sergeant, "when the rebels were getting up their regiments in the names of East Tennessee, a party of them belonging to Captain Rogers's company of Minute-men (as they called themselves) went to the house of James Revis, a peaceable Union citizen of Meigs County, and demanded his gun. He told them that his gun was at his brother-in-law's, and that they could go and get it. They said that he must go with them and they made him run before them. They would try to run him down on him. They got him in this way until he was so tired that he could hardly walk, and then one of the men got down off his horse, and Smith struck him in the mouth with the breech of a gun, knocking several of his teeth loose, and bruising and cutting his face badly. In the fall of 1862, Revis made his escape through the mountains to Kentucky, leaving a wife and six little children to the mercy of the rebels. He enlisted in Company H of the Fifth Tennessee Regiment Volunteer Infantry, and was promoted to Corporal. He belonged to the color-guard of the regiment, and was one of the three out of five of that guard that were killed at the battle of Resaca, Georgia, on the 14th of May, 1864. He told me most of these facts himself."

This class of outrages were so common that it is hardly worth while to chronicle them, excepting as specimens of daily occurrences in East Tennessee at that period.

The Sergeant then related the HANGING OF NORMAN.

"At the commencement of the rebellion Meigs County, Tennessee, was noted as one of the strongest rebel counties in the eastern part of the State. There were few Union men in the county, and it was dangerous for a Union sentiment from the very dawn of the rebellion.

"About the 8th of November, 1861, all the bridges on the East Tennessee, Georgia, and Virginia Railroads were burned down by the Union men. The loyalists were generally all banded together in secret organizations called Home Guards. In some counties—those near the mountains—they were public; but in the extreme southern East Tennessee they would have been instant death to every one belonging to them. It was by this secret League that the resolution was made and carried out to burn all those bridges over which the rebels had moved the greater part of their forces to Virginia. As soon as the bridges were burned down every Union man in Meigs County and all parts of East Tennessee who could see his way escape into Kentucky was arrested and charged with having been in the destruction.

"Among the loyalists thus arrested was an old man by the name of Henry Norman, who was seized by a squad of soldiers sent from Calhoun. They went to Norman's house after dark, and took him and his family that they had come to hang the rebel Lincolnite. After abusing him and his family for some time, they "taken" him and his family and started for Calhoun. They went as far as John George's house that night; staid till morning; got some whisky there, and traveled all day till they got to Moses Bowmer's place, where they stopped at night. One of Bowmer's daughters made a little negro sing, and John M. Hawser—I'm sorry to say, Sir, that he's a relative of mine—Hawser stood by with a pistol pointed at old Mr. Norman's head, and made him dance. After they started from Bowmer's they made the old man get on one of his own horses and take a rebel flag and ride along before them, pointing their pistols at him and threatening to shoot him if he murmured. They then made him get off the horse and walk before them; and they compelled him to run, and often tried to run their horses over him. They shot at him every little while with their pistols.

"They got to Calhoun (Tennessee) late in the evening, and as they went into the town they told the old man that they would hang him that day. Some time after dark they started with him from town to where there were some small trees and tied a rope around his neck. They jerked him about like a rat and threw him down several times, which bruised his face very much; and then they put the rope over a limb, pulled the old man up, and let him hang until he was nearly dead. Then they let him down, and asked him if he know any thing about the bridges being burned.

"He told them he did not.

"They pulled him up the second time, and let him hang until apparently they thought he let him fall to the ground—about four or five feet, he said—which bruised him very much.

"After he had recovered so as to be able to speak, they asked him if he knew any person engaged in burning the bridges, and a great many other questions.

"He told them that he was innocent, and knew nothing of the men that burned the bridges.

"They pulled him up the third time, and that time they would hang him dead.

"He told them to hang and be d—d!

"They pulled the old man up to the limb the third time, and let him hang until they thought he was dead, when they let him fall to the ground as before. They left him there.

"After lying some time the old man recovered so as to be able to get up. He then got on his horse, leaving twelve miles. After he got home he was confined to his bed for three weeks. His neighbors would not dare to come. He finally recovered and made his escape to the National army. He enlisted in the Fourth Tennessee Cavalry, and died in the hospital at Nashville last winter.

"The men that were engaged in this affair were his own neighbors. They have since joined the rebel army.

"Old Mr. Norman himself told me these facts," he added the Sergeant concerning the subsequent fate of the other parties of his narrative.

He said that "Norman's family are still living in Meigs County. One of his sons is now in our army. He was a prisoner in the hands of the rebels at the same time with myself at Knoxville. The others are in the rebel army. Jim Smith is a Second Lieutenant then, and he is one of the worst rebels in the county. The Hawsers are the same. The only thing she had after her husband joined the National army. She is very poor now. Moses Bowmer joined the rebel army. One son cleaned him out, and burned down all his houses to the ground. He had taken his negroes South with him. Hawser joined the rebels and deserted them. Bowmer died here. But I'll be blowed if any one of these rebels can live in East Tennessee after the war is over. You may be high on that."

SERGEANT WILEY'S STORY.

SERGEANT REYNOLDS having ended his narrative, a young man named Wiley, of the Fifth Tennessee, the same regiment, volunteered to state what he knew of the sufferings of the loyalists of East Tennessee. One entirely was of medium height and thick-set; he had regular and good features, a broad and high forehead, and frank blue eyes; was energetic, active youth, with that determined yet dashing air that distinguishes the Westerner after the peaceful tendency has been modified by the toils by a few years of earnest struggle with the world. No one who hears him talk doubts the truth of his stories. His remarks applied chiefly to the older Tennessean whom I have heard tell what they knew of the horrors of rebel conscription. I do not believe that any one of them "told the whole truth" on a rebel guerrilla who should chance to encounter them; but the sum of their brief reminiscences one feels that their only difficulty is to describe adequately all that they have been through and seen and suffered.

PERSECUTIONS OF THE LOYALISTS.

The orderly's family at the outbreak of the rebellion shared the same fate as every other Unionist in East Tennessee; contributions in kind were levied on them both by the regular and irregular forces of the insurgents. Then came the dreaded conscription. Every loyalist was liable to be "drafted up in squads of from 50 to 100," and make their way through the mountains by lonely and secret paths to a common rendezvous in Kentucky. Each of the Union women who lived in the mountain counties—sleeping in caves, or rock houses as they call them—was compelled to cook for a squad of rebels every time a squad came down by-path; traveling at night lest any of them should be warned, many of them but illy clad—their garments were wet, wounds and thrilling enough to satisfy the most adventurous spirit, and are dazzling enough in looking the plot of many a novel of our civil war by writers yet unborn for a century to come. Those Unionists who did not get by every means in their power to the rebel army—sometimes dragged from their sick beds and lodged in jail or forced into the ranks—had to pay enormous fines. Wiley mentioned that Paul Page—most of them, according to the Sergeant, having been enlisted in the Union prison of Nashville—were detailed to do the work of "hunting up the Lincolnites;" and it was by this infamous company that many of the outrages were perpetrated on the loyalists of Roane County. "They shot several in my neighborhood," said the Sergeant, "for nothing more than that they was Union men."

In March, 1862, the persecutions were renewed. The rebels began their system of universal conscription. "There was another stampede for Kentucky," said the Sergeant. "My father and three brothers saw that we could no longer enjoy our homes, and so we resolved to make our escape to Kentucky. My father was sixty odd years of age. On the 24 of March my mother and two sisters prepared provisions enough to last us some five or six days. We had our rations to carry; for there had been so many going through the mountains that they had eaten up every thing. After six hard days' traveling through the mountains, night and day, following a narrow path, a narrow path through the woods and rocks, we arrived at Barboursville, Kentucky. We all enlisted. One of my brothers was murdered. He was going from Goldsten to Cartlage, and some bushwhackers shot seven holes in his body and left him lying on the road. Some citizens buried him. The rebels killed two others at the same time."

Pausing for a moment the Sergeant told with considerable zest how two "Union girls" he knew "laid out" a rebel soldier. I give the story in his own words:

TWO UNION GIRLS.

"In the winter of 1861 there was a man lived in Scott County, Tennessee, by the name of Markum. He was a true Union man. There was a detachment of rebel cavalry came through the country, and they stopped at Mr. Markum's. He had two very fine daughters. Mr. Markum was not at home when the soldiers came. One of them tried to get hold of one of the girls. She ran around the house, and the soldier after her. While this was going on there was a small boy, a brother of hers, run for her father, who was not far off at the time. While the boy was gone after the old man the girl run into the house, and then up stairs, the rebel soldier after her. The other sister in the mean time had got hold of an axe. She ran up stairs and set in with the axe, and a combat commenced between the two girls and the soldier.

"By this time the father had arrived at the house, and saw what was going on. He immediately grabbed a rifle, and rushed to the rescue of his two daughters. The girls had struck the soldier with the axe before the father came; but he run up stairs and killed him. He missed not a lick. The two girls still kept working with the axe until the father got the top of the pistol out of the soldier fingers, and the other received a dreadful wound which knocked out her right eye and a part of her skull bone.

MURDER OF HENDRICKS.

"I knew Harrison Hendricks that was murdered. In February (1861) there were two companies of the rebel army, Captain Bill Henry Gibson and Tony Butler. They were not connected with any regular command, but went all over the county robbing and killing every Union man that did not do just as they wanted them to. They went to the house of James Phillips in Anderson County, Tennessee, and arrested Harrison Hendricks, and kept him a prisoner for a short time. He then saw a chance, as he thought, to get away from them. He broke to run; but they overtook and fired on him and shot him in the back, and he fell to the ground. He fell within a few feet of the house, and managed to get to see him. The rebel soldiers came down to where he lay. He asked them to give his money to his wife, who stood in need of it; but they turned a deaf ear to him. He left a wife and one child to mourn after him.

ESCAPE FROM THE IRON CAGE.

"At the commencement of this war," said the Sergeant, "they taken Thomas Russell, of Anderson County, prisoner, and taken him to Knoxville, Tennessee. They put him in the county jail, his horse and saddle. He was kept in the jail at Knoxville seven weeks, with nothin' scarcely to eat. In March he and a great many others made their escape from prison. At that time there was two captains of the National army confined in the same prison in an iron cage. They managed to make a kind of wrench out of a pair of locks, and taken [they made] all the screws loose in the cage, and then waited until after night. At this time there was two rebel prisoners in the lower room, who assisted them in making their escape. Russell, who was one of them, was cutting a hole in the floor the rebel soldiers held their blankets to catch their chips; and while the guard was walking on their plank in a middle and danced to prevent the guard from hearing them chopping; and one of them watched fix the interior of the cage in order to open the gate. It was arranged that the rebel soldier would give one hard rap on the wall when he opened the outside gate, so that the two Union prisoners would tell when to strike.

"When they heard the signal each man gathered him a piece of iron that came off from the cage that they had previously unbolted in, and then they made a rush for the outside door; they found a corporal and two guards there. One of the Union prisoners gathered the guards' guns, and the others knocked down the corporal and killed him, and then crept forward to the outside door, where they met Lieutenant of the Guard. He shouted, 'Stop here, boys! get back!' At that moment one of the prisoners felled him to the ground. He was badly wounded, but he was struck with a heavy piece of iron.

"The man that caught the guns of the guards was Martin Pennington. He got a wound in the breast from one of the guards, but he succeeded in taking the guns. Russell was carried out and put on them two miles from Knoxville. There he gave out and lay down. He was recaptured, and sent back to the jail at Knoxville, and a large penalty to mourn after him. The other prisoners escaped.

ASSASSINATION OF ISAAC DUNCAN.

"At the same time, and by the same men, Isaac Duncan, of Anderson County, started across the mountains toward the rebel lines, to trade for some thread for the use of his family. He heard that the rebels were in that county, and went back into the mountains with some of his friends. They tried to conceal themselves in an old waste-house.*

"The rebels came along the road and saw their tracks, and followed them up to the old house, and found them all asleep inside. They surrounded the house, and then shouted to the sleepers:

"'Come out of there, you — Tories!'

"The men rose to their feet and gathered their rifles. The rebels fired a volley through the back of the house, and wounded one of the men inside. He recovered himself and fired back, and broke a rebel's leg. The party outside fired another volley through, and yelled,

"'Surrender, you — Tories!'

"The men inside saw that they were going to be taken, and they left their guns and crawled out under the house—all except Duncan and Mike Lowe. They remained in the house and were taken prisoners.

"They taken Mr. Duncan and Mr. Low around the house. Butler and Gibson then had a dispute whether they would kill him or keep him a prisoner. While they were discussing it George Gibson, brother of the Captain, pushed through the crowd, placed his pistol to Duncan's head, and shot his brains out. He left a wife. His half-brother lay like in the bushes near by, and heard Duncan beg them to spare his life."

GROUNDS AT ANDERSONVILLE, GEORGIA, WHERE ARE BURIED FOURTEEN THOUSAND UNION SOLDIERS WHO DIED IN ANDERSONVILLE PRISON.—SKETCHED BY I. C. SCHOTEL.—[SEE PAGE 634.]

NATIONAL BURIAL-GROUND AT ANDERSONVILLE.

THE history of Andersonville is the most sad, and at the same time the most disparaging to our confidence in man's humanity to man, of all the episodes of the late war. That history has now become monumental. The graves of the soldiers starved and poisoned and brutally murdered there are not scattered about over the innocent hill-sides of our land, but are dug under the sod that drank their blood and bore witness to the cruelty of WIRZ, WITHERS, and the rebel authorities at Richmond, who kept these demons at their posts.

On the 24th of August JAMES M. MOORE, Assistant-Quarter-master, left Hilton Head for the site of Andersonville, where they had been engaged for a month in identifying the graves and giving honor of sepulture to the wanton butchered victims of rebel barbarity, who suffered all manner of torture and death in that notorious prison-pen. Captain MOORE and party, consisting of clerks, prison-keepers, carpenters, etc., to the number of forty-two, including MISS CLARA BARTON, who first suggested the possibility of accomplishing this noble work, left for the South July 8. At MACON GENeral WITHERS, who took a deep interest in Captain MOORE'S work, detailed a small force to assist him, and on the 26th of July the party began their labors. The dead were found buried in trenches on a site selected by the rebels about 300 yards from the stockade. The trenches were from three to four feet deep, and in a clayey soil. It is rather remarkable that it is the only clay soil in all that vicinity, and it is therefore inferred that the rebels selected it to prevent the exhumation of bodies by the action of the elements, thereby adding to the effluvia from the vicinity, of which the people are so accustomed in that section loudly complained.

By means of a stake at the head of each grave, which bore a number corresponding with a similar numbered name upon the Andersonville Hospital records, most fortunately captured by General WILson last spring, Captain MOORE was enabled to say that he was enabled to identify, mark, and honor the graves of thirteen thousand of the dead. To all but five hundred of these buried in that vast cemetery a neat tablet, about two feet high, painted white, and lettered in black, with the number, name, regiment, and regiment of each, was placed at the head of each grave.

Nearly eight thousand feet of pine lumber were used in these tablets alone. The cemetery has been divided by one main avenue running through the centre, and intersected with lesser avenues, and in such a manner that with the aid of the numbers a visitor can go to any particular grave without difficulty. A space of one rod square is left between the rows of graves

"But I do think it; and it's just because I think it that I am here now. I want to tell you something."

Saxon bent his head, and listened.

"Something which I have been keeping to myself for years, because—well, because I have never had a friend to whom I could confide it. I mean a really intimate friend whom I could trust, as I know I may trust you."

"Thank you," said Saxon, simply.

"I have felt the want of such a one, bitterly," continued the Earl. "It's hard to live forever brooding over one idea, without being able to seek sympathy or counsel."

"I should think it must be," replied Saxon "but I've never had a secret of my own."

"Then, my dear fellow," said the Earl, throwing away the end of his cigar with a decisive look, "you have never been in love."

Saxon made no reply. He had fully anticipated some confidence on the subject of money, and his friend's rejoinder took him by surprise.

Had he been asked, he could not have told why it was so; but the surprise, somehow, was not a pleasant one.

"The truth, Trefalden," said the Earl, "I am a very unlucky, and a very miserable fellow. I love a woman whom I have no hope of marrying."

"How is that?"

"Because I am poor, and she has nothing—because I could not bear to see my mother—or my mother's wishes—because—in short, because the woman I love is Olimpia Colonna."

Saxon's heart gave one thundering beat—as Castlewers spoke the name; and then his breath seemed to come short, and he was afraid to speak, lest his voice should be unsteady.

"Had you guessed my secret?" asked the Earl.

Saxon shook his head.

"I feel sure my mother has guessed it, long since; but she has entire confidence in my honor, and has never breathed a syllable to me on the subject. All her hope is that I may repair our shattered fortunes by a wealthy marriage. Proud as she is—and my mother is a very proud woman, Trefalden—she would rather see me marry the child of Bat Batherton, whose father was a common miner, than Olimpia Colonna, with her eight hundred years of glorious ancestry!"

"Eight hundred years!" repeated Saxon, mechanically.

"Ay, one of the noblest families in Europe," continued the Earl. "The Colonnas were sovereign Dukes and Princes in the Papal States, were Norman Counts, and the Wynnecliffes simple Esquires. They have given many Cardinals to Rome, and Popes. They have repeatedly held the rank of Viceroys of Naples, Sicily, and Arragon; and they have numbered among them some of the most famous generals and statesmen of the Middle Ages. I tell you, Trefalden, it is incomprehensible to me how my mother, who attaches such profound importance to birth, should weigh gold against blood in such a question as this!"

He paused, seating the floor with his foot, and too much absorbed in his own story to pay much heed to Saxon's manner.

"But then, you see," he continued presently, "money is not the only obstacle. The man who wins Olimpia Colonna must go heart and soul, hand and fortune, into the Italian cause. I would do it, willingly. I would melt my last coronet into coin, cut down my last timber, mortgage the roof over my head, if I had only myself to consider. But how is it possible? A penniless exile—a mother to beggary?"

"Of course not."

And then there was another pause. At length the Earl looked up suddenly, and said:

"Well now, Trefalden, what is your advice?"

"Advice!" stammered Saxon. "You ask me for advice!"

"Undoubtedly."

"But how shall I advise you?"

"Simply by telling me what you think I ought to do. Should I, for instance, talk in ever wilder language of speak to Olimpia first? He is her oldest friend, and his opinion has great weight with her. There lies my chief hope. If I can but win me I do not think she would persist in any lengthened opposition. Besides, I would do any thing to make sure of Olimpia's return of fortune. I know I could work my way in Parliament, if I chose to read up facts and figures—mere questions. I could cultivate my influential friends, and try to get some foreign diplomatic appointment. In short, give me but the motive, and I will do any thing."

"But these are matters of which I know nothing," said Saxon.

"I am not asking you how I shall push my way in the future, my dear fellow," replied the Earl, eagerly; "but how you think I ought to act in the present. What would you do yourself if you were in my position?"

Saxon, rising a little way from the light, with his elbow resting on the table and his head supported by his hand, looked down thoughtfully, and hesitated before replying. His friend had given him a hard problem to solve—a bitter task to perform.

"Are you sure that you love her?" he said presently, speaking somewhat slowly.

"As sure as that yonder sun is now shining in the heavens!" said Wyly Trefalden, she was the ideal of my boyhood; and for the last four years, since she has been staying with us so often, and for so many months at a time, I have loved her with the deepest love that man can love to woman."

"And do you think that—that she loves you?"

Do what he would, Saxon could not quite keep down the tremor in his voice as he asked this question; but the Earl was too intensely preoccupied to observe it.

"A year ago—nay, three months ago," said he, "I was certain of it. Latterly, I can not tell why, there has been a constraint—a coldness—as if she were trying to crush out the feeling from her own heart, and the hope from mine. And yet, somehow, I feel as if the change went no deeper than the surface."

"You believe, in short, that Miss Colonna loves you still?"

"By Heaven, Trefalden, I do!" replied the Earl, passionately.

"You have not asked her?"

"Certainly not. She was my guest."

Saxon covered his eyes for a moment with his hand, as if overcome by emotion. This was an eventful moment—a cruel moment—the first moment of acute suffering that he had ever known. No one but himself could know how sharp a fight he fought while it lasted—a fight from which he emerged wounded and bleeding, but a conqueror. When he lifted up his face, it was pale to the very lips, but steady and resolved.

"Then, Castlewers," he said—and his voice had no faltering in it—"I will tell you what I would do if I were in your place. I would learn the truth from her own lips, first of all."

"But my mother—"

"Lady Castlewers will acquiesce when she knows that your happiness is involved. It is but a question of fortune after all."

The Earl sighed again, and began pacing to and fro.

"It is welcome counsel," said he. "If only dared—if I were but sure—and yet, is it not better to know the worst at once?"

"For heaven's sake, Castlewers!"

Lord Castlewers went over to the window, and leaned out into the sunshine.

"Why should I not?" he mused, half aloud. "If I fail I shall be no poorer than I am now—except in hope. Except in hope! But if I succeed—all is changed!"

His face grew radiant at the thought.

"Yes, Trefalden," he exclaimed, "you are right. Why should I not? The sooner so many obstacles if, when all is done, I am to find that I have had my toil for nothing! I will ask her. I will ask her to-day—this very hour, if I can find her alone. It will be no breach of hospitality to do so. Thanks, my dear fellow, thanks a thousand times!"

Saxon shook his head.

"You have nothing to thank me for, Castlewers," he replied.

"For your counsel," said the Earl.

"Which may lead to misery, remember."

"Then for your friendship!"

"Well, yes—for my friendship. You have that, if it is worth any thing to you."

"Time will show what value I place upon it," replied the Earl. "And now, for the present, adieu. I shall not return to the rooms. When the last echo of his foot had died away on stair and corridor the young man went over to the door, locked it, and sat quietly down, alone with his trouble.

And it was, in truth, no light or imaginary trouble. The new, strong emotion that had accept one of two things—both equally bitter. Either Olimpia Colonna had never loved him, or he had misinterpreted the signs of affection. Which was it? His heart told him.

FEMALE TENDERNESS.

It was one of a party of five (it was in the old, palmy days of traveling, long before the railway engine shot across the country, and the coach sat as a pea-shooter), in the inside of a stage-coach, composed of a few slop-seller, the captain of a collier, a carman-driver, an elderly maiden lady in green spectacles, and your humble servant. We had jogged on some miles, and not one sound had been uttered, except by the spy of the lady's brandy-bottle, which, by-the-by, was very ingeniously made to look like a bound volume of one of the large gold letters, "Spiritual Devotion." At first I imagined the lady was of a serious turn, by her frequent applications to the flagon.

"There's nothing like reading, madam," said I, "to soothe the mind. Rather a thick volume—scarcely get through it in a day, I should think, by the appearance of its contents?"

"I beg your pardon, Sir; I have gone through its contents twice this day."

"Then, madam, you must have a tremendous swallow! or perhaps there is a great variety?"

"Not at all, Sir; not a variety of any description."

"Of course, madam, you must be fully perfect in the—"

"Perfect, Sir! I always have an extract in my mouth, and can in a moment hit upon the place where I left off."

"Extract, it appears an octave size! is it not?"

"No, Sir," said Mr. Sweetbread, the butcher, who began to take part in the conversation, "by its size I should think it was a quarto."

"And the edition is London, is it not?"

"No, Sir; Cork!"

We kept trundling on quiet enough for some time, until Mr. Sweetbread said he found himself attacked with a headache, and in order to relieve it, he took a pipe; therefore, he trusted it would not be disagreeable if he drew the coach-window up, that he might not have the draught. This was, of course, objected to; and I merely intimated that I was sorry he had the headache, as, being rather low-spirited, I found myself compelled to indulge myself with a tune on the French horn. Mr. Sweetbread, however, lighted his pipe, the lady took another leaf out of her "Spiritual Devotions," and I was preparing to pluck my horn out of "Der Freischutz" when symptoms of distress reached me from the coachman left his box, and clambering up to the coach-window, the following conversation ensued:

"I am sorry to stop the coach, ma'am and gentlemen, but you see I know what's what?"

"Oh, ay, you know what civility's worth, coachee."

"I just do, Sir—it's worth a crown from every inside passenger, and three shillings from the out. But I want to ask you a question, ma'am. Pray, how many children have you got?"

"Oh! never talk of having children."

"Well, how many have you, Mr. Isreal?"

"Five, perhaps six; for I haven't been at home there eleven months."

"How many have you, Mr. Sweetbread?"

"Seven."

"Any of 'em little, Sir?"

"Yes, worry little, worry little."

"Poor things!"

"But why do you ask all these questions, coachman? and why are all the outside passengers getting into the main?"

"Why, Sir, they are all family people. I'm going to take the horses out; and as for the coach, that's inverted. We don't mind waiting here half an hour for the sight."

"For what sight?"

"Why, for the blow up!"

"The blow up! why, what do you mean?"

"Why, don't be frightened, ma'am, but Mr. Sweetbread's pipe is a perfect gunpowder of tobacco-der!"

"Oh! oh dear! gunpowder! why there's no knowing how we may be blown."

None at all, ma'am. Most unpolite thing—gunpowder! Suppose you was a gentleman, to pull up against a skylark, or make you give a black eye to the man in the moon?"

"Oh, Sir, coachman, I put it out, put it out. Consider what an indelicate death: for the love of your family, Sir—"

"Pho, pho, you foolish woman, it is out, isn't it?"

"There's no knowing, Sir. Really, Sir, a spark may be about you. I think, for the satisfaction of the passengers, you had better, coachman, get yourself in that ditch, in case of a spark."

"Well, it's very hard one can't enjoy a pipe !"

"Well, Sir, you hear what the coachman, Sir, I think I can accommodate you in the boot; or, if you like, you may ride with me on the box—that is, if you'll agree to take a chance there of the whip!"

Matters being adjusted, we proceeded on another stage, when another halt had to encounter confusion and delay. The coachman was regaling himself with some foaming ale, when he was accosted by an official-looking personage:

"Well, coachee, how are you for room?"

"Why, I've only one inside."

"Only one inside! how many would he have?" said the lady with the book.

"Well now, you see, ma'am, how many would he have?" said the lady with the book.

"Why, I'm riding out of the country on the service of government."

"On the service of government!—a scientific man, doubtless, sir, perhaps in the chemistry or geology—or is he acquainted with Botany?"

"Why, not yet, ma'am—though that's what he's going for. The fact is, ma'am—"

"Now, no nonsense, coachman," says Sweetbread; "is he not a convict?"

"Why, Sir, you see, he's shedding calls 'em; but we as have pity, says unfortunate."

"Pho! pho! why, he has the gallows in his face?"

"Yes, Sir; and now he's worn irons he's got a bonnet in his bag!"

"Oh! I can't admit a felon; I shall leave the coach!"

"I shall leave you, ma'am! he isn't a felon—he's only found guilty of burglary."

"Burglary, oh! what, ride with a burglar! I wouldn't for the world. I will leave the coach—I will leave the coach!"

"Don't do that, ma'am—there's no occasion; the poor fellow only took to himself somebody's till, it war handcuffs for the rest of the journey."

"But, burglary! he has committed burglary, Mr. Coachman, and you'll ride with him for the world!"

"Burglary! who said burglary? I said bigary —bigany, ma'am—he's transported for marrying seven wives!"

"Seven wives! Four follow! let him come in."

HIGH-HOUSE.—It does not say one among us who does not keep a lucky-bone!—when the pleasure of partaking a favorite joint is the fate of human, is unknown! It is a most delightful sensation, and is only equaled by the exquisite pain of a lifting corn—if the dear creature will but have the kindness to sink its first corner deeper toward completion of operation. But I do believe in him, and will positive trust a being absolutely baby-hearless exclusively for the purpose of your wearing out your shoes away without the intelligence of a toe, or the dashing of a doll. No, no, my friend, you may depend upon it, or dear it, we all have our particular boot at home, and we can not wear any other. Let our enemies go barefoot, or any boy opening somewhere about the establishment, though we all choose different kinds of boots, and have idiosyncrasies in the matter of airing-grounds.

TRYING TO SURPASS A CROCK.—An amusing story is told of a lady who tried to smuggle a clock across the Canadian border. She gave the clock-case particular directions to the Custom-house officers that it would not strike; but the Cuttock, being considerable of a wag, set the alarm to strike at twelve o'clock, and the lady fainted on her arrival at the Custom-house. The lady fainted the timepiece escaped, and the Cuttock starved to his own amusement during the journey. Arriving at the Custom-house, the officer found nothing contraband among her effects, and was passing on the next traveler, when a loud whir-r-r was heard under the lady's skirts. The strange noise was kept up for the full space of a minute; but to the lady it seemed an hour, and she became tremulous and excited. The Custom-house officer, not daring to lay hands on a woman, "away in the way of kindness," obtained an iron rod, with which he felt around the crinoline for the concealed clock, and finally succeeded in bringing it down.

MOUSTER.—Some one has said that a young mother is the most beautiful thing in nature. Why qualify it? Why young? Are not all mothers beautiful? The sentimental outside beholder may prefer youth in the grisette or the ballet-girl; but we instinct to think that our mothers, who are most intimately concerned in the matter, love their own better than any other mother's child. How superior of something baby and venerable is he when a stroke of his "dear old mother's" ivory with your inkstand "mamma," and "mamma" says there's a good little boy, who deserves a cake, and passes a drawing-room maternal protest, who is afraid to touch the baby, for fear of rousing her poor nerves! Just so the homely mother, the sons of whose love are all enough, and whose domestic virtues are beyond reproach, whether arrayed in satin or modestly habited in homespun.

A CURE FOR COLDS.—The subjoined letter, from a well-known Boston druggist and apothecary, has been published several years ago in a Boston paper: "Messrs. Tisdale, and Commissioners, and Gentlemen: I send the following simple preparation during the terrible raging of colds in that city a few years since, and as no old the remedy fail where the patient could be reached in season. It is so low and effective in colds—and also in early diarrhœa. A remedy so easily procured, and so vitally effectious, should always be at hand, and a small vial of it can be had for twenty-five cents, and no family should be without it overnight. The writer of it received the recipe a few days since, and, having been seriously attacked with cold—from the first symptom of sneeze to its almost magical influence in affording relief from excruciating pain. He writes: 'I send you by my own wives open tree three lines will cut this article from the paper, and prepare the mixture immediately by the simple application will relieve pain. and, promptitively, save life. A WORK OF MECHANICAL CONVENIENCE.—Which has often heard the seductive strains of ladies of the demi-monde dancing beauty from the Alhambra, or the gay promenades at German watering-places, but of the gentlemen, never imagined that the son of a fashionable lawyer, by unloading the evolutions and other accessories of fashion, could accomplish the feat of dancing in the full costume of ancient family, and thus trick admiring dupes out of their money. Such, however, has been the case. Whichsoever a butcher's son, who managed to get in a good position as a waiter at one of the dancing saloons, and not accidentally discovered, got clear off with his booty.

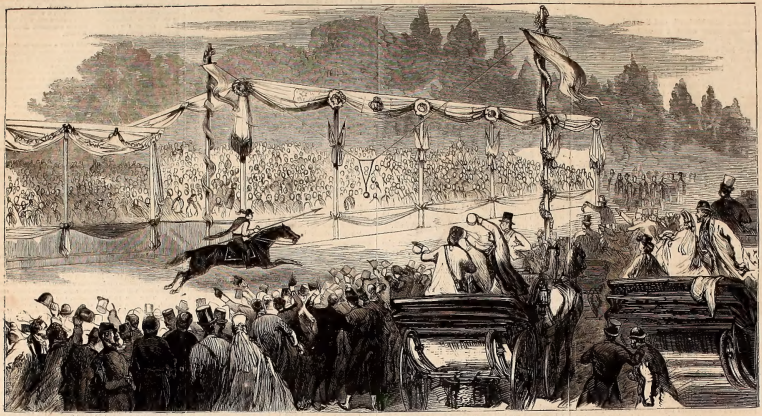
A GERMAN professor to have counted the hairs on the heads of four hundred of different colors, and has just published the results. On the head of the blonde there were 140,000 hairs; that of the dark-haired woman, 109,440; on that of the black-haired, 102,962; and on that of the red-haired, 88,740. The average weight was this disparity in the number of individual hairs, each one was found to possess weight. The average weight of a woman's hair is stated, on the same authority, to be 14 grains.



THE CHARMS OF BAVARIAN BEER.—Listen to the entrancing effects of beer.—I have a friend who, when the thoughts of the exile recur—to the beer of his country—sits down in a corner, and sings in a voice of thunder. He will bring you beer unordered; and when you have emptied your glass, persuade it with a friendly remark. A doctor the climate of Munich does not agree with you, and you will take it for a consumption. You will not be able to shower or train is due, and you are told you have to hang to drink beer. Go to Munich, and you will replace Champagne with the rich and dancing with the beer. I can not say that I like beer, but I have used it some time; but when I came away dancing had not been, and all the society were sitting still as ever, drinking beer.

THE world once boasted of possessing seven wonders: it is greater than any one of all these is a free nation. His feelings, enjoyments, aims, and objects are such that he is more than a conqueror. He is a man as Man of Men: but those imitated, like himself, in the mysteries of the faith, are also to be numbered. Flying, yet, the nature to deal in trappers and sinew—he lives! surviving, he enjoys! Seeking, he finds! Finding, he possesses! Having, he makes many rich; reversing the common proverb, and with "saving all" he is blessed! Giving away wholly in what he does not see than in what he sees; contrary to the ordinary habit of mankind. He is more interested, attracted by distant objects than by near ones; his self, the focus of all, is a fixed point, his horizon and his horizon bands; his homeward path is at the beginning through a bank of clouds, and ends in a blaze of light, leaving God. He is confident of wending nothing, yet depends on the bounty of One who deposited for him a bond on others, and had not a place where to lay his head. He is a man of Men, and he is a man of Men of Men; and expects a crown of glory from Him who were no crown on earth but a wreath of thorns.

CONSULAR APPOINTMENTS.—In one of the western departments of Europe, in the year 1861, the Chief Magistrate of comprising against the republic, was seized and committed to prison. His wife, according to the law, had every means that courage and affection could inspire to procure him his liberty. She was informed that he was bought with a sum of money sufficient to pay him a similar visit in his prison. At the appointed hour she arrived before her husband, clothed in rare suits of her own apparel. With the permission of the jailer, she began to criticise a tincture to give or receive serious demonstrations of tenderness she hastily threw off her outer vestiture, prevailed upon her husband to put it on and to walk the prison yard, while she, in his dress, left the chapel, and the stranger was not discovered till the succeeding day. A similar stratagem every civil era engaged consulates, "what have you done?" "My duty," was the reply. "Then," said the Consul, "you have done according to law expectations, the committee were instructed with her husband, that they did not consider it to her husband, pardoning birth.

THE BLOOD-HOUNDS OF THE WEST INDIES.—Experiments, who would be astonished at the boomerang supplies in which he and his talking generally of the boomerang supplies that he had brought with him. Chinese Kings of Hayti was passing; and there were numbers of blood-hounds which the natives had with them. These dogs were employed in the chase of cattle, and so nearly exterminated the race of wild dogs as to render them scarce. Some of the natives had a dead nag." Monsieur Ogeron, the governor of Tortuga, in 1685, made a chase for a stray cow with a pack of them. "Hence were killed and emasculated, and laid on the ground, where each dog came to receive a part. Being continued for six months there was killed on its genitals mutilated and yet still this could not destroy the race, or cause diminish them, their numbers appearing towards the south. The Spaniards have brought a great horde to hunt in packs. Engineering and a French Governor of the Island organized a chase, and scouring through the woods and took refuge in a tree, where they found an old Indian, who had lived there for a number of years. As soon as the hour was dead the whole pack lay down and waited till the hound who had pursued the enemy had satisfied his hunger before they presumed to begin their own repast.

A HUGE GRAPE-VINE.—One of the celebrities of Spanish California is a grape-vine now growing at the Montezuma, three miles from Santa Barbara, on the road to the Buenaventura. It was planted in 1786. Its trunk is twenty inches in diameter, rises about three feet from the ground, and the vine is trailed over some eighty feet square, supported by a trellis-work of poles. In the season of ripe round grapes, clime upon 6000 pounds in weight. Some of these have been weighed from a vine mineral spring in the neighborhood.

TILTING THE RING.

A TOURNAMENT ON THE POTOMAC.

THE game of the Tournament, as practiced in the District of Columbia and State of Virginia, bids fair to become a popular amusement, and may eventually become a national sport. There is a want of some such manly pastime in this country. England has her fox-hunting, and perhaps no exercise is more healthy or better calculated to produce bold, fearless riders, and self-reliant men; but it is objectionable as almost excluding the fair sex, and consequently has a brutalizing tendency. The tournament, unlike fox-hunting, enlists the sympathies of the ladies, who form an essential element in the sport; at the same time all the qualities of the fox-hunter are requisite in the male competitors—a good seat on horseback, a steady hand, a quick eye, and the fearless dash of a cavalry charge, are all necessary to insure success; such an exercise can not but produce much physical benefit to the young men of the nation; and when incited to gallant deeds by the smile of beauty and encouraged by womanly influence, it can never degenerate into a gambling, horse-jockeying, or black-leg institution, as is the case with too many of our turf amusements.

The general mode of procedure at a tournament is as follows: A ring from two to three inches in diameter is suspended on a hook high enough to allow the riders to pass under it, each rider or knight is armed with a long spear, and in his turn tilts the ring at full speed—the speed is 100 yards in five seconds. If he carries off the ring he scores one, if he misses it or is not up to the required speed when he takes it, he does not score. Three tilts or courses in succession is the general number tried, the knight who takes the ring oftenest has the honor of choosing the Queen of Love and Beauty, the next best choosing the maids of honor. After the tilting is completed the knights are drawn up in line in front of the judge's stand, who then names the successful gallants and the honors they are entitled to. They then proceed to the ladies' stand and make choice of the Queen of Love and Beauty and her maids of honor; the whole cavalcade then form in procession, the beauties in a carriage, the gallant knights on horseback, and proceed to the ball-room, where is erected a throne to which the Queen and her maids are conducted, after which the knights under their distinguishing names—such as Knight of Orange, Knight of Columbia, etc., etc. — are presented to the Court of Love and Beauty. This concludes the ceremony, and knights and ladies fair join in the mazy dance.

INTRODUCTION OF KNIGHTS TO THE QUEEN.

DANCING BY MOONLIGHT.

The accompanying illustrations are from sketches by MR. ANDREW MCCALLUM, taken at a tournament of the ASSOCIATION of Georgetown, District of Columbia, which took place at Analostan Island (formerly Mason's Island) on the River Potomac, and will give a better idea of the merry scene than any description.

THE FOUNDER OF "ODD FELLOWS."

We give on page 638 a portrait of the late THOMAS WILDEY, the founder of Odd Fellowship in this country, and an illustration of the monument erected to his memory by the members of the Order at Baltimore on September 20, 1865.

THOMAS WILDEY was born in London, on the 16th day of January, 1783, during the reign of GEORGE III., and about the close of the Revolutionary war. At five years of age he was placed at school, where he had but limited opportunity of education, and from which he was withdrawn in his fourteenth year to be apprenticed to a trade, in which he continued until he reached his majority, in the year 1804. He became an Odd Fellow at an early age, being initiated into Lodge No. 17, of the city of London.

He arrived at Baltimore September 2, 1817. His efforts to build up the Order of Odd Fellows in this country met with ill success at first; but April 13, 1819, he succeeded in gathering together at his own house a private meeting, and on the 26th of the same month the purpose was consummated by the institution of Washington Lodge No. 1. Thus was set in motion that organization which is now recognized as the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

During the ten years which followed he instituted four lodges in Maryland, organized the Grand Lodge of Maryland, the Grand Lodge of the United States, and originated the Patriarchal Order; he had extended the institution to Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and the District of Columbia, in each of which States Grand Lodges had been formed, and out of these Grand Lodges the present Grand Lodge of the United States. In 1829 he entered upon his second official term as Grand Sire of the Order, having already served four years. In 1839, having sacrificed official position, we find him in the same Grand Lodge at Philadelphia, still laboring in the cause to which he seemed to have devoted his life. At this time the Order was eminently successful. It had been introduced into New Jersey and Rhode Island; he was there to give it life and energy. He carried it to Delaware, Ohio, Louisiana, Kentucky, and Virginia, and received in recognition of his services the thanks of the Grand Lodge at its next session.

In 1840 the Grand Lodge of the United States ordered the full-length portrait of Mr. WILDEY, and in 1841 again deputed him upon official business to the East and North. From this period the Grand Lodge of the United States, which had hitherto been for the most part composed of proxy representation, began to consider plans for assembling the State jurisdictions by proper personal representation. In 1843 the measure was set on foot, and consummated in 1803. The effect of this wise act of legislation upon the prosperity of the Order it is almost impossible to value. It assembled representatives in 1843 from twenty States; and in September, 1860, assembled representatives from every State in the Union, not excepting Oregon, and from the District of Columbia and the Territory of Nebraska.

Since that time the Order has gradually, and each year with greater celerity, extended its fellowship and usefulness. Mr. WILDEY, though infirm with age and disease, continued an active member until his death, which happened in 1861, put an end to his useful career.

The monument has been located at a very commanding point, being at the apex of the hill on Broadway as it rises from Baltimore Street, in a wide open space, in one of the squares in the centre of the street, with a good view on all sides. The structure is 52 feet 7 inches high, and stands upon a base of rough granite 10 feet 6 inches square. All except the base is marble. Immediately above the base is a solid marble block, facing the cardinal points, and in it has been placed tablets with inscriptions executed by wreaths. On the north side of the base are the words: "He who realizes that the true mission of man on earth is to rise above the level of individual influence, and to recognize the fatherhood of God over all, and the brotherhood of man, is a true and loyal gentleman." On the east side base is plain. The north tablet has the words: "This column, erected by the joint contributions of the Lodges, Encampments, and individual members of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the United States of America, and jurisdictions thereto annexed, as a memorial to the fostering of that Order in the City of Baltimore on the 25th of April, 1849, by THOMAS WILDEY." The south tablet has this: "We command you to visit the sick, relieve the distressed, bury the dead, and educate the orphans." The other tablets have appropriate inscriptions and figures. The whole is surmounted by a statue of Charity.

The erection of the monument was celebrated with an enthusiasm which will make the day a memorable one in the history of the Order.

SONG OF THE EUROPEAN PEASANT.

"We plow and sow, we're so very, very low
That we delve in the dirty clay,
Till we bless the plain with golden grain,
And the vale with the fragrant hay.
Our place we know, we're so very low,
To down at the landlord's feet;
We're not too low the grain to grow,
But too low the bread to eat.

"Down, down we go, we're so very, very low,
To the hall for the king and queen;
But we gather the proudest gems that glow
When the crown of a despot shines.
And whoever he lacks upon our backs
Fresh loads he deigns to lay;
We're far too low to vote the tax,
But not too low to pay.

"We're low, we're low, mere rabble, we know,
But at our plastic power
The mould at the lordling's feet will grow
Into palace, church, and tower,
Then prostrate fall at the rich man's hall,
And cringe at the rich man's door;
We're not too low to build the wall,
But too low to treat the floor.

"We're low, we're low, we're very, very low,
Yet from our fingers glide
The silken floor, and the robes that glow
Round the limbs of the sons of pride.
And what we get, and what we give,
We know, and we know our share;
We're not too low the cloth to weave,
But too low the cloth to wear.

"We're low, we're low, we're very, very low,
And yet when the trumpet's ring
The thrust of the poor man's arm will go
Through the heart of the proudest king.
We're low, we're low, our place we know,
We're only the rank and file;
We're not too low to fight the foe;
But too low to touch the spoil."

The N. Y. Tribune says: It is full of valuable popular information on almost every point that concerns the physical and social well-being of men, women, and children, set forth with profuse pictorial illustration, and in a style of constant freshness and vivacity. We regard this wide-awake Journal as a valuable means of family education, inasmuch as by its pages a store of practical knowledge which will last for more service than that which they obtain from the schoolmaster.

The N. Y. Christian Inquirer says: The principles of temperance are numerous and life-like. The illustrations in other departments are equally attractive. The tone of the Monitor is eminently liberal, and adapted to the Journal's purpose. It is to make good apart from its pictures, but with a full outfit in the large circulation which it has secured.

The N. Y. Methodist says: Many of the practical teachings of the Journal are of the highest value in the promotion of physical development and health. Price only 10 cts. Sample Nos. 20 cents. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y. and all sites at moral improvement.

The White Pine Compound.

"It was early in the spring of 1855 that this compound was originated, a member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a dis-tressing cough. I had for some months given much study and a prep-aration leading for its basis the inside bark of white pine might be so combined as to be very useful in this disease of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the case alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine that I had been planning and gave it to her. upon the first dose. The result was exceeding gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I came to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks from a bad cough, accompanied by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She was found relief, and in a few days more. She took about ten ounces of it and got well. J. B. Clarke, Esq., Editor of the Londonderry Daily Telegraph, was one of the same proportion in the case of a severe cold, and was cured speedily by it. He was then induced to try the results, and so confident in its success attending its use, if placed under the care, that he had a quantity given to me to give it a name and test it abroad to ben fit the suffering. In November, 1857, I first invested in the manufacture of White Pine Compound. In two years from that time there had been wholesaled in the Manufactured of over one hundred dollars' worth, where it took the least of all the cough remedies in the market, and it still maintains that position. There is good reason for all this: it is very soothing and healing in its nature, is warming to the system, and very pleasant withal to the taste, and is exceedingly cheap.

"As a remedy for Coughs, Colds, and Sore Throat White Pine Compound stands unrivaled. It was not originated for that purpose, but in the using it for a family remedy in the early care of the cough, but was also cured of a kidney difficulty of two years' standing. Since that time every discovery many thin ands have used it for the same complaint, and have been entirely successful.

The above was written by Dr Poland in 1865. Since then, as in Manchester, the White Pine Compound has taken the lead of all Cough remedies, as well as progressive Coughs, Colds, Bronchial difficulties, Asthma, Hoarseness, and hoarse throughout the New England States.

This remedy is so safe and pleasant to take as it is effectual.

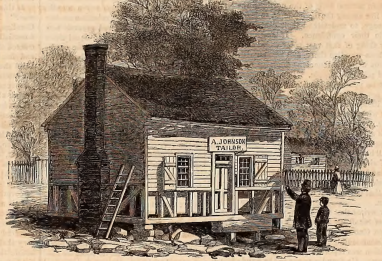
PARDON-SEEKERS AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

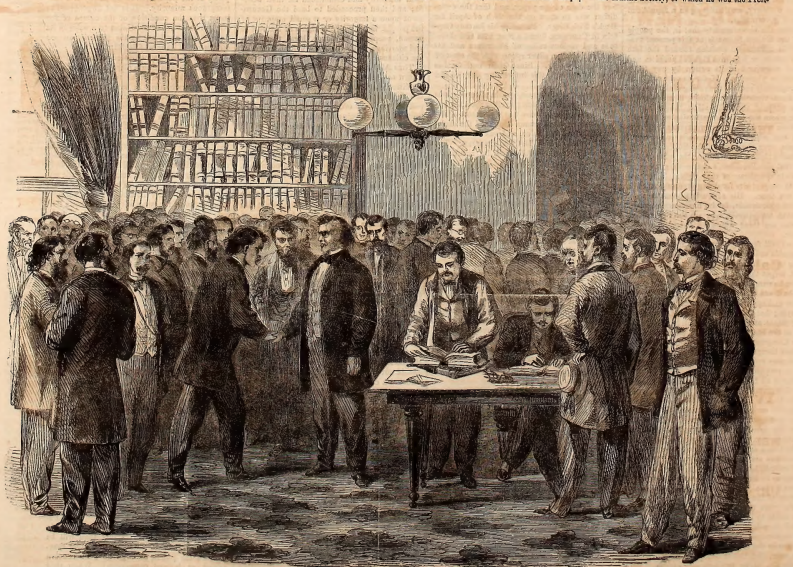
We print on this page two engravings pertaining to two very different periods in the life of President ANDREW JOHNSON. The first is a picture of the tailor-shop in Greenville, East Tennessee, where as a young man he labored at his trade. One of his comrades, still living, says that Johnson could beat him at making a coat, though his spelling was rather below the mark. But the future President mended in the matter of spelling after he married, as we all know, and has rather outstripped his old comrade. Our second illustration represents President Johnson in the attitude of pardoning rebels who have returned to their allegiance. Hundreds of these pardon-seekers daily besiege the White House. They crowd into the ante-room and are ushered into the President's presence each in his turn, and if found all right on the record they are pardoned, otherwise not.

THE LATE CAPTAIN MARSHALL.



CAPTAIN CHARLES H. MARSHALL, recently deceased, was a native of this State. He was born in North Easton, Washington County, in 1792, and at the time of his death, which took place at his residence in Fourteenth Street in this city on the 23d ult., was in the seventy-fourth year of his age; and when dying was in the full possession of all his faculties, and surrounded by his children. He died as he had lived, a sincere Christian and a true patriot.

At the age of fifteen, a mere stripling, and in apparent delicate health, weighing then but 96 pounds, he left the family homestead in the Mohawk Valley, with but fifteen dollars in his pocket, to seek his fortune on the ocean. He reached Albany, walking there on foot for many miles, and took passage on a sloop to New York, which it took the sloop nearly eight days to reach! Steam motion and railways were then scarcely thought of. Looking about this city, which at that time contained a population of only some thirty or forty thousand, he could find no vessel to gratify his desire for a sailor's life, and went to Nantucket, where the whaling business afforded to the young and daring adventurer an opportunity for the exercise of his talents. We find him at the age of twenty-six in the command of the ship Julius Cæsar; then taking a command in the "Old Line" of Liverpool packets, and commanding and building the most splendid ships in that trade.



ISAAC WRIGHT & SON had established the "Old Line" in 1819. THOMPSON & GODDARD succeeded them; and when the "Old Line" had not fulfilled the expectations of those who were interested, GOODHUE & COMPANY, Captain CHARLES H. MARSHALL, and the other owners, bought it out, and placed the agency of it in the hands of the subject of this sketch. How well and how faithfully he discharged his duties is familiar to all interested in that line. To keep pace with all the improvements in navigation, to compete successfully with foreign vessels, and to avail himself of the genius and skill of American ship builders, he secured WILLIAM H. WEBB to construct his ships, and under this great marine architect he successively had built for him the ships Europe, Columbia, Montauk, Fidelia, Isaac Webb, Great Western, Hottentot, and several other packet ships, thereby giving a great impulse to American navigation.

Captain MARSHALL became a member of the Chamber of Commerce many years since, and has been an active and efficient member, rendering substantial aid to the Government.

The Marine Society, of which he was the President for the last twenty years; the Loyal League Association, of which also he was President; and many members of the Chamber of Commerce and other eminent citizens, attended his funeral in a large body to testify their respect to this eminent citizen. Admiral Farragut; Ariel A. Low, Esq., the President of the New York Chamber of Commerce; George W. Bleby; William H. Webb, were among the pall-bearers at his funeral, which took place at Doctor Hitchcock's church, on the corner of the Seventh Avenue and Fourteenth Street. The attendance was large, and among the number we noticed Admirals Kingsland, Henry Greene, Hall, H. H. Gerinell, Robert L. Taylor, Adam P. Penye, and many other merchants of New York, who had thus drawn together to testify their respect for this great commercial representative of the City of New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1865.

THE UNITED STATES AND STATE SUFFRAGE.

A CORRESPONDENT asks, "What right has the Government of the United States to interfere with suffrage in a State?"

That is a question for the President to answer. He has interfered in the most absolute and summary manner. Although, according to a theory which has many friends, but which Mr. Lincoln considered "a pernicious abstraction," the rebel States have never been out of the Union, and are constantly out of it with every resistance to it; yet the President has set aside the Governors elected under their Constitutions, has dictated the terms on which they should vote, and has imposed certain essential points upon the Constitutions which he, and not the State authorities, has determined shall be reformed.

The principle of this extraordinary action is supported by every loyal man. The President acts not by any supreme authority whatever, but from the necessity of the case and for the public safety. He justly assumes that as the people of the United States had undoubtedly the right to suppress the rebellion, and utterly disregard the voice of the rebel States in doing it, so they have exactly the same right to exercise power upon conditions which they deem indispensable. If they think that it is dangerous to the public welfare to allow a vast minority of the people of the rebel States to be disfranchised, outlawed, they will rightfully refuse to assent to the outlawry, and insist upon a republican form of government.

Either the Government—that is, the people —of the United States is at this present moment in a perfectly anomalous position with the rebel States, or it is in a rightful position, and is not restrained in its action by any State regulation whatever. If, for its own safety, it may rightfully prevent the voting of persons in the State Constitution admits, it may for the same purpose rightfully allow the voting of those whom the State Constitution excludes.

Those who insist upon supporting the President and who assert that under all circumstances, even the present, the States have the exclusive right of determining the suffrage, forget that the President's course thus far is an absolute overthrow of that right. They profess to support him for doing precisely what he has not done. His action has been the most radical conceivable, for he has assumed to determine, without any law, who are the people, who are those who shall exercise political power.

And still further, those who insist upon the inviolable sanctity of the State right of determining the suffrage, and yet support the President, forget that he has not appointed those whom he names as the source of political power in the State shall proceed without his supervision and approval. On the contrary, instead of saying that the rebel State shall proceed to elect they please, and ipso facto it shall be the organic law of the State, he tells them plainly to bring it to Congress for what purpose? Clearly to justify that Congress may determine whether the State may reorganize itself as the new Constitution proposes.

But if all State rights are unimpaired, what has Congress to do with the Constitution of a State in the Union? In a year or two New York will amend her Constitution. Will she do it in obedience to orders from the President? Will she submit it to Congress for approval? Of course not. Then, if Mississippi be a State of the Union exactly as New York is, why should Mississippi act under authority of the President and submit her Constitution to the action of Congress? For the same reason that an apple is not a pear. For the reason that she is not a State of the Union exactly as New York is. If she were the President's action would lay him liable to impeachment.

All we ask is, that the country shall adhere to the principle of the President's course; which is, that in the unprecedented circumstances of this case, the States lately in rebellion shall reorganize under the authority of the United States, and upon such conditions only as the United States approve. When the conditions have been approved, then, and not before, the late rebel States will be in the Union exactly as the loyal States are. It is possible, of course, that the President may differ with Congress and that the country as to the necessary conditions to be required. We should be very sorry at such a difference, and certainly shall not anticipate it. Meanwhile we sincerely approve the principle upon which his administration has interfered, with the claim of a State lately in rebellion to determine the question of suffrage in its own way.

ARCTIC NEWS.

When we lately spoke of the tenacity of explorers we had no expectation of so immediate and interesting a confirmation of our words. But a letter just published in the Tribune, by Dr. Kane Grinnell, written by the latest Arctic explorer, Mr. C. F. Hall, on the 10th of December, 1864.

Mr. Hall, whose delightful book of last year our readers may remember, is a kind of Arctic William Penn. He believes that the true method for the fate of Sir John Franklin and his men, as well as to discover the important natural facts of the northern regions, is to live among the Esquimaux, to learn their language, to understand their character, and to win their confidence. If any body knows any thing of the Arctic regions and the people by those who live there, and who cherish all traditions with the tenacious fondness of a simple and primitive people, he is Mr. Hall. Seas and ice to be penetrated and its barriers surmounted, not by huge ships and large companies of inexperienced men, but by patient familiarity with the habits and temper of the inhabitants. Mr. Hall goes in a whale boat, and travels and talks with the natives, with his mind concentrated on the single object of rumor and all his observation to the best account. A man of singular simplicity, of earnest enthusiasm, and tranquil devotion to his object, he is probably the most remarkable explorer, the very that Civilization has ever sent to the Esquimaux.

He now writes that there may yet be three survivors of Sir John Franklin's expedition, one of them Crozier, who succeeded Franklin in the command. The last intelligence from the expedition was reported in 1850 by Captain M'Clintock. He found a paper in the handwriting of Captain Crozier, dated April 25, 1848, stating that Sir John Franklin died on the 11th of June, 1847—that the ships Erebus and Terror had been deserted three days before, and that the survivors of the whole expedition was to start on the 26th of April for Back's Fish-River. Pursuing his journey Captain M'Clintock found a boat with provisions and various relics of Franklin and his men, including a silver spoon with the crest of Captain Crozier. Since then nothing has been known until this interesting story of Mr. Hall's.

He says that an Innuit, cousin of some whom he knows, was met with by another Innuit. Three were fat, and one was a skeleton. The fat ones had eaten human flesh, and the skeleton had refused to do so, and was dying of starvation. This last was Crozier. The Innuit fed him carefully and he recovered. The whole party then lived with Crozier, and he bought their furs and ammunition, they lived comfortably. One of the party died, and at length the other two, with Crozier and one female, set off for the nearest whaler, to reach some means of escape homeward. It was ten years ago, in 1854, that Mr. Hall's friends had seen the party on the shore of Repulse, and at that time he had not heard whether the party had ever returned. But the Innuit in the main they are honest.

This is Mr. Hall's story. When he wrote he had but recently arrived, and was at the threshold of his journey, for which he was equipped in two years. It is not impossible, therefore, that the modest and heroic man who embarked in the enterprise with a kind of intense religious zeal, may solve the problem, may solve the long-hidden mystery, and reveal the end of the sad romance over which the world has so long wondered.

ALABAMA.

We hope that our readers faithfully read and ponder the report of the proceedings of the various conventions in the late rebel States. The country is fast approaching one of the most critical trials it has experienced. The President and Congress will each express their views upon the question of reorganization. Should they agree exactly all will go well. Should they differ, it is of the utmost importance that public opinion should be so instructed in the facts as to be firm and intelligent in its demands.

If the spirit of the conventions seems to be truly healthy, if they show that they accept all the results of the war honestly and frankly, the difficulties of the situation will be wonderfully relieved. But if their action is seen to have been merely compulsory and reluctant, and it is clear that their intention is merely to do still hostile to the spirit and letter of the Government, the day of real peace will be grievously postponed. Of course no sensible man expects the conventions to say that the rebellion was a monstrous crime. But honorable men may fairly be expected to act honorably. They will not shirk nor evade. If they think the States sovereign they will say so. And such men will not be surprised that a nation which has just successfully asserted its supreme sovereignty should endanger its victory.

The action of the Alabama Convention was more reasonable than was justly anticipated from its first proceedings. It unanimously resolved that the act of secession was wholly unauthorized and is null and void, but, by a vote of 58 to 34, refused to vote its unconstitutional. Slavery was declared with only three dissenting voices out of 92, and provision was ordered to be made by the Legislature for the protection of the freed colored population. By a vote of 60 to 19 the rebel State and Confederate debts were absolutely repudiated. The Convention resolved that the white population only should be the basis of representation; and, by a vote of 61 to 25, decided to submit the amendments to a popular vote.

The action is good as far as it goes. But the issues are so important that it must be strictly scrutinized. A State which seven months ago was in open and determinate rebellion against the Union upon certain declared grounds now asks to be admitted to a full and equal share in the legislation of the Union upon the conditions then stated. Let us look closely at their character.

The Alabama Convention by declaring the act of secession null and void admits that the Convention of 1860 had no authority to pass such an act; but by refusing to condemn it as unconstitutional it refuses to the State right of secession, and does not deny that another Convention might lawfully authorize secession. This was the very ground of the rebellion; and the Convention refuses to relinquish it.

Slavery is abolished and prohibited by the act of the Convention. But unquestionably it is done under the public consciousness of constraint, and it is perfectly competent for another Convention to re-establish slavery. It is unconstitutional in order to abolish slavery, but not have removed it from State control by recommending the adoption of the emancipation amendment to the Constitution of the United States. That would have left no room for suspicion or apprehension.

The Alabama Convention also declares repudiation of the debts inherent in the people and that all free governments are founded in their authority and established for their benefit; and therefore proposes to base the Government upon a minority or a small majority of the people, leaving all the rights of the rest in person, property, residence, legal testimony, and marriage, to the absolute will of a class of the citizens.

Thus Alabama, by her Convention, offers to return to the loyal power in the Union upon condition that the United States will concede the constitutional right of secession, and the political ostracism of half the population of the State; that half being entirely composed of the people whom no threat nor falsehood could induce from their unswerving fidelity to the Union during the darkest hour of the war.

Do the gentlemen of the Convention really suppose that the people of the United States, victorious in a long and arduous war, will now acknowledge the constitutionality of secession and consent to perpetuate that concentration of political power in the hands of those who are the mainsprings of the rebellion? Like a shrewd trader Alabama begins with her lowest offer. But she is very much skewed to suppose that it will be considered satisfactory.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The South Carolina Convention has also agreed upon its offer and adjourned. As we have before remarked, it has omitted the declarations, struck by the Provisional Governor Perry, was the Dred Scott decision.

The Convention repealed the ordinance of secession by a vote of 103 to 3. It declared by 99 to 8 that as slavery had been abolished by the action of the United States authorities it should not be re-established in the State, and directed a commission to submit a code to the Legislature for the protection of the colored population. It repealed some of the most glaringly aristocratic provisions of the Constitution; resolved that the white population only should be the basis of representation; and appointed a committee to go to Washington and intercede for Jefferson Davis, Mr. Magrath, and Mr. Trenholm. So far as appears it did not repudiate the rebel debt, but provide for a popular ratification of its action.

The South Carolina Convention, by merely repealing the act of secession, neither denies the right of secession nor the authority of the Convention of 1860. It simply declares that it is now expedient to reconsider and reverse a legitimate action. It repeals the ordinance as a legislature repeals a law which it was perfectly competent to pass. It will not, however, be forgotten that the act of nullification in 1833 was "repealed," but the repeal did not prevent the ordinance of secession in 1860. It was not meant to do so. South Carolina then reserved her right to nullify as she now reserves her right to secede. In the present Convention Mr. Hammond, son of the late Senator, offered the opportunity of renouncing the ground upon which the rebellion was justified by proposing a series of resolutions, one of which expressly acknowledged that "seventy-six, and, absolutely and individually, which in all nations must exist somewhere, resides in the American people, and its authorized representatives, within the limits of the organic law—the Constitution—is the Federal Government." The resolution went to the committee and did not return.

Like the Alabama Convention, that of South Carolina declared all political power to be inherent in the people, and then based the Government upon only a minority of the population. The spirit of the Convention may be inferred from the speeches and Message of Governor Perry and the remarks made by the leading members, as well as by its authentic acts. Even that part of the population which is declared to be allowed political power is not allowed to pronounce upon the proposed Constitution.

Is this an "acceptance of the results of the war?" Is there any evidence here that South Carolina, formally or informally, verbally or inferentially, renounces the theory which has disrected this country for more than a generation and finally culminated in terrible civil war? Does she take the least pledge not to renew the theory? And moreover if while the organization of a renewal may now seem, is it not for that reason all the more important that at this time all shadow of legal pretense for secession shall be utterly removed? Shall the people of the United States—and not a certain class in South Carolina—who are now to decide this question, decide plainly and indignantly and forever, that while the right of revolution for hopeless oppression can never be renounced, the right of secession and State sovereignty are fictious too monstrous and perilous to be openly or covertly tolerated for an instant?

It is not an unkind humiliation of those who have been defeated in the most strenuous effort to destroy the Government under the plea of a reserved Constitutional right, to require that they shall as most solemnly renounce that plea before they are admitted to an equal share in the Government. It is not an unwise nor unconstitutional exercise of power for the States to recognize as republican a political system which puts every political and personal right of a majority of the population at the mercy of a contemptuous minority. It is not oppressive to insist that the condition of the return of the bitterest enemies of the Union to a voice in its administration shall not be the postponement and oppression of its most faithful friends.

Nor is there any question of authority in the case. Either South Carolina as a State of the Union has the right to refuse to make any change whatever in her Constitution, and to claim the recognition of her Senators and Representatives in Congress exactly as those of New York are recognized, or the United States have the right to insist upon such conditions of her return as will secure and expedience may suggest. South Carolina, by the assembling and action of her Convention under the authority of the United States, has already yielded that claim. She acknowledges the authority of the United States to dictate the terms of her return. Let the United States not misunderstand the grounds of generosity. Let not a vest of palms if they allow dragon's teeth to be sown.

SHALL WE HAVE SPECULATION THIS FALL?

This is a question of no little interest, not only to the brokers of Wall Street, but to large numbers of individuals who made fortunes in the Cotton speculation in 1864. Not only in New York, but in every city of the Union, and even in Canada and in London and Paris, men of speculative temperament and experience, like all Street oracles, Shall we have speculation this fall?

By "speculation" they mean, of course, speculation in railway stocks. There has been all the year a speculation in produce which has carried up prices at Chicago to so high a point that receipts at tide-water are much less one-half those of the same period last year, and the export to Europe merely nominal. And there has been a lively speculation in dry goods, which has made the fortune of manufacturers and helped out the jobber's fall season. There has been a speculation in coal, a speculation in lumber, a speculation in teas and sugars, a speculation in iron; all of which have been more or less successful. The speculation in petroleum has collapsed, and a sudden and disastrous collapse in the Western corner in breadstuffs seems not improbable. Pork and butter, too, are likely to fall some day more rapidly than will be pleasant to holders. But with all these speculations the public at large have no concern whatever as unsalaried consumers. When they speak of speculation they mean speculation in stocks, and in railway stocks; for as yet Government securities have not begun to be specnlated in by the community at large. By-and-by, when the $2,500,000,000 of United States stocks and Treasury Notes try to settle down into a permanent resting-place, we shall have fluctuations and speculation in them. But at present "stocks" mean railway securities, and the question is, shall we have speculation in them?

The most common cause of speculation is an increase of money, or what is the same thing, bank discounts. Whenever the Bank of England began to expand VOLTAIRE bought rentes, and sold when the bank proposed to contract. always making money. When the United States Government began to issue paper money, shrewd men bought stocks and did well. Erie rose from 50 to 150, and other stocks in proportion. Market value in both cases rose in proportion to the increase in the volume of the circulating medium or its representative; and the sight of this steady advance in value set every body speculating. The speculative fever, which began here late in 1862, culminated in April 1864, and though prices have fluctuated considerably since then—at one time falling very low, and again rising to high figures, speculation has never since been general.

If we compare the volume of currency afloat now with that which was afloat in April 1864, we shall find that it has increased. Over $175,000,000 of compound-interest notes, legal tender notes, and over $150,000,000 of national bank currency have been issued in the interval. Of the national bank currency, however, a large proportion of the older issues have been withdrawn from circulation, and are hoarded in view of the well-known purpose of the Department to call them in. They are therefore be said, at the present time, to contribute to the redundancy of the currency. Of new compound-interest bonds, and Treasury Notes of late as money, of plain legal tenders, of national bank currency, and of State bank currency, there is now afloat at this moment more than $935,000,000 afloat. In November, 1862, when the last speculation first began to develop, the aggregate volume of currency afloat was not more than half this amount. In April, 1864, when the speculation culminated, the total volume of currency in circulation was not over $600,000,000.

If, as the Controller of the currency predicts in a recently published letter, Congress should, next winter, authorize the issue of $300,000,000 more national currency for the benefit of the South, this amount would have to be added to the volume given above, and afloat. Should, to that event, assuming the issues of the currency bureau to be continued at their present rate, we might expect by November 1866 to have in round numbers a thousand millions of dollars of paper-money afloat, exclusive of compound legal tenders. Nor would this enormous figure fully represent the possible inflation. For the national banks, to live, must lend money; their discounts will be far in excess of their circulation; and for the time being legal tender lent will produce the same effect upon values as if it had been a dollar found or created.

All the points, thus far, are in favor of speculation. There are others which make against it. In the first place, the price of railway stocks is not low. All the sound dividend-paying stocks are already selling at a price equal to be, taking the average dividend of the past five years as a criterion for the future. Buying Erie for one of as 88 is a purely gambling operation from buying it at 50. When it was doubtful whether the currency would not eventually prove good for nothing, a man might put his money in Erie at 125 without much risk; but now that the legal tenders are morally certain to be worth, sooner or later, one hundred per cent. in gold, there is no reason why they should invest in stocks unless they promise a larger return than money will command in good bonds in Wall Street.

Again, nothing reliable is known concerning the expenses of the railroads. It is known that two leading railroads, the Erie and the Michigan Southern, which showed last year expenses amounting to 75 and 65 per cent. respectively of their gross earnings, developed large floating debts at the close of the year. Are the leading lines spending all they earn at present? Are the expenses swallowing up all the gross receipts? No satisfactory answer has yet been given to these questions, and until the facts are known a certain class of operators, consulting careful capitalists, will not buy railway stocks.

Finally, what is Mr. M'CULLOCH going to do about the currency? He has already begun to fund the interest-bearing legal tenders, offering $50,000,000 of Five-Twenty bonds at 103 in exchange for compound notes—which he proposes to take at their face and interest. It is not supposed, in well-informed quarters, that this operation will disturb the money market, as the compound notes have already been withdrawn from circulation by reason of their superior value to ordinary circulating notes. But suppose it should be proposed to withdraw any portion of the plain legal tenders? Suppose the Secretary should be able to show to Congress that large additional revenue from customs and taxes, with perhaps the aid of a small loan, would suffice for the expenditure of the coming year, and at the same time that a new issue of $200,000,000 of Five-Twenty bonds might be floated at par—the notes received in payment of such loan to be canceled? It is clear enough that the withdrawal of even $100,000,000 of currency would be severely felt in Wall Street, and that stocks of all kinds, railway as well as government, would decline materially.

If it were definitely settled that no contraction of the currency—beyond the funding of the interest-bearing legal tenders—was to be attempted, for a year at all events, and that the expenses of the railways are not eating up their whole income, operators would not dispute in seeing a speculation inaugurated even on the basis of present prices. The gross earnings of the roads are marvelous. They will average more than twice the amount required before the war. And the country is full of people who have "tasted blood," and are eager to speculate once more. Of the great fortune of 1863 very few remain. Most of them perished in the storm of April 1864. Of the remainder the bulk slowly dribbled away in the inexplicable fluctuations which ensued. But the men who made and lost them are here still, and are as eager as ever to seize the "royal road to fortune."

What has been will be again. It may come now or may be delayed. But when it does come, it will be by far the most extensive development of speculation ever seen in this country, as far exceeding the furore of 1863–4 as that one excelled any previous outburst of stock gambling in the annals of our stock exchange.

PRINCIPLES AND MEN.

THE attempt of some of the Democratic papers in the State of New York to make use of the services of General BARLOW as foolish and futile as it would be to deny those of General SHERMAN. Both are young men and have been brave soldiers.

The present difference between them is, that General SHERMAN never chooses to be the representative of a party which has steadily denounced the war and insulted the soldiers, which has been the great bulwark of slavery and State sovereignty, which, in fact, was the sprang; which is now desperately opposing the emancipation amendment in New Jersey and Ohio, as a means of keeping the full life of the Government by taxing the national bonds, and whose policy of arming the still dangerous civilians of border States has directly provoked SLOCUM has himself most unanswerably exposed and condemned.

General BARLOW, on the other hand, is the representative of the party which has always adhered to the supremacy of the Union; which has never excused rebellion, nor thwarted the Government in An effort to suppress it, nor declared it triumphant; whose principles have been proved to be essential to the salvation as they are to the prosperity of the country, and which is planted fairly and firmly upon the American doctrine of equal rights.

General BARLOW and General SLOCUM are at present the representatives of principles and tendencies. Every Copperhead and unconquered rebel in the country, could they vote in the State election of New York, would vote for General SLOCUM. "Who is General BARLOW?" asks the Albany Argus. He is a true soldier of the Union and Republic, who has defended it and sanctively opposes at the polls as every rebel feared him in the field.

"A YANKEE."

THE NEW YORK correspondent of the London Spectator, a gentleman friendly to the Confederal, has done signal service to the good cause during the war by his temperate and lucid letters. Under the heading of "A Yankee" he has given a view of the situation, with which we could not always agree, but which was the fair expression of a certain class of Americans. The signature would have been more exact had even the word Yankee, as it was used during the war, really signified the antagonistic spirit to "the South." But in the politics "the South" means privilege, aristocracy, slavery—in a word, caste; while "Yankee" means equal rights. We have heard in every quarter of the Confederate and clever letters of "A Yankee" for any proof of his sympathy with the principle represented by the South he has given.

But it is impossible for any American who believes the American doctrine of equal rights with his whole heart and soul—who believes in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE as ABRAHAM LINCOLN believed in it, and who is wholly sure of the fidelity of the controlling heart and brain of his countrymen to the principle of civil and political equality, to read without amazement and indignation the statement of "A Yankee," in his letter in the Spectator of August 26, that DEACON PHILANDER BUTTON at Greenwich, Connecticut, spoke for any considerable body of sensible and intelligent Americans, or the astounding assertion that "the fact of the ballot-box means the negro in Congress, in all public places, in the parlor, at the table, in the marriage bed."

If, as "A Yankee" says, the aversion to the negro is "the great moral force" which must be considered in all projects of restoration, if it is so universal, so insuperable a loathing, why should we have cared whether he were enslaved or not, and how can his admission to the ballot-box possibly smooth his way to the social table or beyond? Is a parent never to allow that another man shall vote until he is willing to accept him as a son-in-law? Because we contest for impartial suffrage, are we therefore to invite every personally distasteful voter to dinner? MR. BELMONT and MR. ASTOR assent without effort to the voting of Mackerelville. Do those gentlemen select their society from the same region?

It would be a serious check to the sympathy of humane and liberal men in Europe if they believed the extraordinary statements of "A Yankee" justly to represent public opinion in this country. If they supposed the intelligent mind of the United States did not yet understand that the late war in this country was a struggle between Equal Rights and Caste, they might well believe that a victorious people who have no radical convictions would be instantly outwitted of their victory by their opponents who have. That there is a vast and bitter prejudice against the negro in this country, carefully fostered by unclean demagogues for political ends, we freely admit. But that the white people of the United States "loathe" the colored men, or "revolt" at the idea of their voting, we absolutely deny. They mean to have no black class in which they will marry and educate their friends as they do now, and will equally protect PHILANDER BUTTON and ROBERT SMALL in the exercise of the same privilege.

A GOOD SIGN.

IT is pleasant to know that steamboat owners and steamboat companies having had their Jay, Grand Juries and Courts are having their. DAVID SMITH and TUNIS SMITH, owners of the steamer Arrow, which exploded some weeks since, have been indicted for manslaughter. They have been arraigned, have pleaded not guilty, and were admitted to bail in $6000 each.

We hope to hear equally good accounts from the Brooklyn Grand Jury, in the case of the wanton slaughter upon Mr. OLIVER CROMWELL of Long Island Railroad; and if a Connecticut jury does not indict Mr. HURT, the superintendent, and Mr. PLUMB, the conductor, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, who was directly responsible for the fearful massacre upon the Housatonic Railroad, that steady State will show itself less careful of human life than it did when it passed a law requiring every railroad train to stop before passing a bridge.

When the managers of roads and boats of every degree learn by sharp experience that they will be held criminally responsible, and stockholders discover that disasters and driving also pay 20 together, there will be some security in travel.

LIKE AND LIKE.

WHEN the rebels were invading Pennsylvania two years ago the rebel press was loudly praying for the success of the Democratic party. A Democratic partner with the cause of rebellion and treason that it was safe only when the party of "the proud record" was in power. We are not surprised, therefore, to read that MR. VALLANDIGHAM, the leader of the frank rebels in the present South Carolina Convention, introduced the following resolution at the beginning of its proceedings:

"Resolved, That, under the present extraordinary circumstances, it is both wise and politic to accept the condition and basis of reconstruction as recommended by events which we can not avert or correct, and to await from the time and opportunity to effect our deliverance from unconstitutional rule?"

and that he explained it by saying that he thought they ought to be quiet "till we are strong enough to make the aid of the Democratic party of the North, to get a constitutional government."

It ought to not remarkable that an unconquered rebel hopes for the restoration to power of a party which last year declared the rebellion successful.

THE DEFENDERS OF THE CONSTITUTION.

THE South, a Democratic paper in New Orleans, says that it has "accepted the situation," says, cheerfully:

"The Democratic leaders are nearly ready to cry, 'Up boys, and at 'em!' For years the radical Republicans have been viziers—their 'veiling ambition has overleaped itself,' and defeat is before them, provided all good citizens do their duty.

"VALLANDIGHAM, SEYMOUR, PIERCE, WOOD, LONG, stand in their hands to the people of the Southern States and say, 'Come and help us beat the enemies of the Constitution and the State rights doctrines of the fathers of the Revolution.'"

Why is it that unconquered rebels always appeal for help to the Democratic leaders? Is their sole sympathy with treason or palliation of rebellion in the "proud record?"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

SOUTHERN CONVENTIONS.

THE South Carolina State Convention was convened in the Baptist Church at Columbia at ten September 13. Its Convention consisted of 154 delegates, all of whom, with the exception of five or six, were present. Judge L. D. WARDLAW was elected President. No sooner had a committee been appointed to wait upon the Governor than MR. ARTHUR offered a resolution to the effect that South Carolina, while willing to accept the situation, was forced upon her, and demanded her opportunity to throw off restraint. Pertaining to the Ordinance of Secession, which was declared null and void by the Convention of 1865. Ex-Governor PICKENS reminded MR. ARTHUR that there was hardly a State but had seceded. Being prepared that the rules for the Convention of 1865 be adopted in that adopted by the Convention of 1860. MR. ARTHUR remarked that the said absent the 1860 Convention had been declared null and void by the Convention of 1865. Governor PERRY's Message was received. This Message advised a Convention of the people of South Carolina, so that all elections for delegates to Congress could proceed immediately from the people. The abolition of Secession, and that such other acts as may be necessary to restore it would be impolitic, unwise, and not in the best interests of the State.

Resolved, That it is the true policy of the American people to support the General Government in all cases within the limits of the Constitution, and to acknowledge the legislative authority of each State by legislation in every State in its own way.

Resolved, That the late war was not one of an oppressed people against tyranny, but arose from an apprehension on the part of the weaker section of oppression and tyranny in the future, and was carried on under an honest conviction, maintained with conscientious devotion by part of the country, with the adoption of the Constitution itself, that a State had the reserved right to secede from the power it had delegated to the General Government, whenever, in its sovereign judgment, the compact was violated in that those powers would be used to its disadvantage. The war having been decided against the right to secession in the name of civil liberty, we must respectfully suggest to his Excellency the President that the time has arrived for the exercising of that clemency and penalties afford to those crimes by the laws of the United States.

Resolved, That we welcome the return of President Johnson's administration, and will cordially support in the wise and patriotic efforts to restore to the whole country the blessings of peace.

These resolutions were referred to a committee, and were not heard of again.—The sixth day was taken up in discussing the Ordinance of Secession, and on the previous occasions, there were a few who wished to disturb the unanimity of the Convention, but they did not allow them talked gently plainly in regard to the necessities of the case. The Convention then, by a unanimous adopted ordinances ordering the election of State officers on the 20th October, 1865, legalizing the marriages of negroes, authorizing the county commissioners to provide for indigent freedmen, and requiring the municipal police officers to continue as agents of the Freedmen's Bureau.

The Governor elect, Governor ORR, resides in St. Leigh, and organized by electing HON. E. G. Seade President, and HON. D. H. MORE, of Lexington, Vice. Over one hundred members were present. Messrs. Cannon & Hemphill, of the Columbia Guardian, were elected printers.

ALFRED TENNYSON, THE ENGLISH POET LAUREATE.

TENNYSON.

We give above a portrait of ALFRED TENNYSON, the English Poet Laureate, from a portrait recently taken by W. JEWERY of London. He was born about the year 1810 in Lincolnshire, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. While at college, in 1829, he gained the Chancellor's gold medal for the best poem in English verse. In the following year he published his first volume of poetry. The Edinburgh Review was somewhat severe upon this volume, complaining of the absence of any things to indicate the true poetic fire.

The volume published in 1832 showed a marked growth. There are evidences in this volume that TENNYSON had already conceived the design of writing a grand poem on the life of the mystic King Arthur—a design which MILTON had once entertained, but never accomplished. "The Lady Shalott," the opening poem of the volume, and "Sir Launcelot and Queen Guinevere," in a volume which followed, appear to be fragments of a first essay in this direction. In the former we see the author's first conception of "Elaine," and we can see how the same subject becomes a different subject as the master's skill improves. Among the earlier poems of TENNYSON those which attracted the greatest attention were the "May Queen," "The Palace of Art," and "The Dream of Fair Women." In the volume published in 1832 "The Miller's Daughter" is said to have so charmed Queen VICTORIA that she gave him the pension which he now enjoys, and to have paved the way for his selection to the Laureateship upon the death of WORDSWORTH.

TENNYSON published his third volume in 1842, and in the opening poem, "Mort d'Arthur," which preceded to be the eleventh book of an epic of which the other books had been destroyed as unworthy, we see another phase of the grand poem which he had in contemplation.

"The Gardener's Daughter" is one of the most exquisite idyls in our language—in which the minutest observation of nature in tree and sky and flower, in animal and bird and insect, is worked into a simple story of which the incidents are as old as human life, but the interest is, and ever will be, new.

"The Princess" was given to the world in 1848. In it the questions of woman's intellectual equality with man, and her social position in relation to him, are discussed in a whimsical story, full of sparkling gems of poetry, and interspersed with beautiful songs. The conclusion is admirably set forth in the following lines:

> For woman is not undeveloped man,
> But diverse; could we make her as the man,
> Sweet love were slain: his dearest bond is this
> Not like to like, but like in difference.
> Yet in the long years liker must they grow;
> The man be more of woman, she of man;
> He gain in sweetness and in moral height,
> Nor lose the wrestling thews that throw the world;
> She mental breadth, nor fail in childward care,
> Nor lose the childlike in the larger mind;
> Till at the last she set herself to man,
> Like perfect music unto noble words;
> And so these twain, upon the skirts of Time,
> Sit side by side, full-summ'd in all their powers,
> Dispensing harvest, sowing the To-be,
> Self-reverent each, and reverencing each:
> Distinct in individualities,
> But like each other even as those who love.
> Then comes the statelier Eden back to men:
> Then reigns the world's great bridals, chaste, and calm:
> Then springs the crowning race of human kind.

But a shadow had fallen on our poet's life. In 1833, immediately after the publication of TENNYSON'S second volume, died ARTHUR HENRY HALLAM, the friend that was unto him as his own soul. And then he set himself to work, and through the long of sixteen years labored silently to rear a monument of his art to his mom he adores.

> My friend, the brother of my love:
> My Arthur, whom I shall not see
> Till all my widow'd race be true.
> Dear as the mother to the son,
> More than my brothers are to me.

And a noble monument it was that he gave to the world in 1849, under the title "In Memoriam." The poignancy of first grief, the inability to believe it true that one who had lately filled so large a space in our every-day life is withdrawn from it forever, the thought that we should not feel it to be strange if that loved one stood before us again, and all the loss and sorrow and pain a dream, the gradual softening down of this first grief through lapse of time, the getting accustomed to the vacant place and missing counsellor, the final delight of recalling particular scenes we have visited with that lost one, and the word he uttered, and the very look that went to the counting of his virtues, the thought of what he would have been if he had lived, and what we ought to be to be worthy of him—there are few of us whose hearts do not give distinct and painful answer to such touches as these.

In 1850 the literary world was amazed by the issue of "Maud," a production which was said by some to prove the author as mad as a March hare. There was, however, soon found to be "method in his madness;" and, possibly, the hideousness of the vices of one man is but better use in their effect on a sensitive, perhaps over-sensitive, mind than they could have been through any other medium. The poet looked to the war has just breathed as the scourge by which these vices should be corrected.

In the same volume with "Maud" were published other poems, some of which exhibited the author in a new light, as one who observes, and fixes for the attention of future ages, some individual event of marked moment in the history of this. The public funeral of WELLESLEY and the charge of the six hundred at Balaclava are events that stamp the character of the nation, and leave an impression that should not perish on those who were the witnesses of them.

Probably the grandest effort of TENNYSON'S genius is the "Idyls of the King," of which there are, however, but four complete specimens.

The book contains four stories, but they may all be considered as one, all uniting first in the world of "The King." Arthur is only mentioned incidentally throughout them all, but in such sort as to leave upon the mind a vivid conception of his character and the purpose of his life. That character is perfect, that purpose the noblest. We have not space to make the analysis, and set them side by side in connection to prove what we asserts but we think none who take the pains to do so will dissent from us in all that they contain. They, to his patient study, will disclose, in which some have found evidence of pride and self-righteousness, which would, if true, entirely destroy pictures of the perfect man. But do they exist? We think only in the imperfect rendering of the reader. Certain it is they did not strike the Queen herself, for, after the sharpest words of all his rebuke,

> Better the blush of shame than the pale heart, and aching hour
> Than thou reseated in the place of light—
> The mockery of my people and their lord.

He paused, and in the pause she crept on luch

> Nearer, and laid her hands about his feet.

And of that attitude and pose on which the charge of self-righteousness is founded,

> Lo! I forgive thee, as Eternal God forgives!

The words are said in anguish, not in pride, and conveyed, as they were meant, to her mind, the assurance that his pardon was free, large, absolute as that of God himself. Hear her impression of them:

> And he thought
> That all my sin was horrible to him;
> His mercy choked me.
> And blessed him, for now he was high forgiven.
> My wickedness to him
> . . . . . Ah! great and gentle Lord,
> Who wast as is the conscience of a saint
> Among the warring spirits sense to thy knights
> To whom my faire, voluptuous pride
> Would not accept the love that perfected the height
> To which I would not, or I could not, climb,
> I thought I could not breathe in that fine air
> That pure severity of perfect light . . . . .
> . . . . . I saw how that thou art
> Thou art the highest, and most human, too!
> . . . . . Be thine love
> Will tell the King I love him, though so late!
> Myself am changed even to that purer light.
> But now it were too daring.

Nothing need be added to this to show that, however we may read, the author never meant to leave the blot of pride or self-righteousness on him whom he portrays as > Sullen man and stainless gentleman.

It must be confessed that, with all his excellences, our Laureate's genius is not what is called "popular." His songs are many of them set to music, and are sung by thousands, who will tell you that they like the words added not the words themselves do not understand them. How should they, who look only for a pretty conceit or a surface meaning? TENNYSON'S studies but with an earnest depth of purpose, which will not suffer him to explain himself by a multitude of words when a single vigorous expression will convey to those who are capable of receiving it the idea he wishes to implant. Often a description that would occupy a whole line of a meaner master of the art of words is given in a single adjective. And herein also does our age owe him deep thanks that he has done so much to preserve and transmit our noble English language in its purity to later times.

THE PACHA'S DAUGHTER.

SOME of the stories of Mohammed Ali's family are worthy of the grimmest personages in the Thousand and One Nights, and about as valuable in an historical point of view. The Pacha's daughter, the Princess Nasli-Hanem, was a second Marguerite de Bourgogne. She was married to a Turkish commissioner, a monster of cruelty. One day Mohammed Ali hinted to his daughter that he never felt quite at ease with her husband. That evening the Bey's coffee was presented to him by the Princess his wife. Coffee does not always agree with the stomachs of Eastern princes, and Nasli-Hanem sought to solace her widowhood by a systematic course of intrigues. Her emissaries frequented the cafés. When a candidate for introduction had been found, he was desired to present himself at a certain gate of the palace at a certain hour. There he was received by a eunuch of the harem; his eyes were bandaged, and he was conducted to the presence. For a week Nasli-Hanem was the most amiable hostess. On the eighth day, "My husband is coming home," she would say; "you must go." And go he did, but he never should take care that you return." The visitor's eyes were again bandaged. The Princess was left residing at her palace on the Nile, he was conducted to a door opening on the river, and sped forward with rapide pulls, to the spot where a boat awaits the Khalig canal took the place of the Nile. At the palace in the Mekke the same useful office was performed by a cistern. The mysterious disappearances at last began to be talked of; and a young Italian determined to break the spell. He went accordingly to the cafe where the invitations were known to be dispensed. One evening a eunuch of the harem seated himself near him, and arranged his pegan to smoke. "I know a fair lady who is not indifferent to you," he began, "and if you will come with me I can manage matters." "I shall be delighted, if she is good-looking," replied the Italian; "only I can't come this evening. Will you take me to-morrow?" "Be it so," said the black slave. "Be at the door about seven o'clock, and when I pass follow without speaking." Next day the young man kept his appointment. He had not gone far when he felt that he had followed his guide into a lonely street he remembered to be only inhabited by Jews. After a long walk they entered a house, and ascended a staircase. The bandage was removed from his eyes in a brilliantly illuminated room, richly furnished in the Eastern style. A lady, neither young nor beautiful, but admirably dressed, reclined on a divan, playing with a chaplet of diamonds. Behind a sheve fanned her with a bunch of ostrich plumes. The Italian received a signal to approach, and to seat himself on a cushion at her feet. The first conversation was enchanting, sad, with a hostess who had all the accomplishments of her sex, answered agreeably. The eighth day arrived. "We must part, my beloved," she said; "my husband is about to return; you must go." "Shall I not see you again?" her guest, "I trust that your husband has no intention of returning, inasmuch as you are the Princess Nasli-Hanem, and he has been dead for some years." The lady made a slight negative gesture. "Believe me, Madame," he continued, "I know who you are, and I know that you have no cause to be uneasy." "Then you have nothing to fear," replied the Princess was thunder-struck. Recovering a little, she implored him to leave Egypt. The Italian took his leave, and arrived without accident in the street, where he found a caose from the Consulat awaiting him, and informing him that the Pacha's order should be scrupulously disregarded the pretty frequent of his amiable hostess.

BESSIE BEAGLE AND MR. WINDER'S WATCH.

THIRTY years ago I was in the midst of my first grand passion. Its object Bessie Beagle, with whom aunt, old Mrs. Maydew, lived. Bessie was not a beauty, but a trim, tidy dumpling of a girl, with soft brown eyes and an olive skin, and was fond of wearing her plain dresses which made them prettier than other girl's finery. I had been there six months, and was very much intimate. She had not much time, poor child, to spare from household duties, for Mrs. Beagle kept her at work all day and sometimes half the night, and I contrived to see a good deal of her notwithstanding. Sometimes I sat opposite her, watching her busy fingers, and sometimes I carried a trifle in Berlin wool or cotton, and sometimes I contrived to make a message to the shop. Then, much times, I confess, I had held her hand or stolen my arm about her waist, and on two or three occasions I had kissed her. I am sure she liked her good deal, and knew she knew it; though, save a few sentimental nothings, I had never said much to her, and there was no absolute engagement between us.

She liked me too. Nobody knew better than I through whose agency I was made so extremely comfortable.

No matter how late Winder & Co. kept me at their office (Winder was a relation of mine, and the pudding never quite gone. In fact I had my full share of goodies, and a double allowance of clean towels.

I was just nineteen. My salary exactly paid my board; but I had besides a quarterly allowance of five-and-twenty pounds, which was entirely for self, and now and then contrived to purchase trifles for some play or concert, whither I escorted Bessie. She enjoyed such things so! In fact she enjoyed life thoroughly, and I used to think would make any man's life happy who should win her. Such a rosy, cozy, orderly little housewife of eighteen was never seen. Janson Glosk, who sat next me at table, and who was at that time studying medicine, was as much in love as I was, and hated me desperately; but I laughed at him, for he came in late to cold vegetables and small allowance of dessert, and rung twice some mornings for clean towels. Bridget and old Mrs. Beagle attended to his interests, not Bessie. Good little Bessie who, when I had an influenza, made me hot lemonade, and when I had a headache left a camphor bottle on my table where I found it at night—who was a sort of mother to me, young as she was, for those first six months. I thought myself unchangeably in love with her until the day when, with bandboxes and bundles, and shopping-bags and trunks, a cab brought to our door a new boarder—Miss Selina Maydew—who, in the temporary absence of her parents, were intended to be the care of Mrs. Beagle. She was a blonde, with the most glorious color in the world. Ah, five years ago I saw a picture by Louis Lang, I believe, christened "Day," which put me in mind of her. Living woman I never saw just like her. Her hair was light, dashing naturally, and dressed extravagantly. I think she was past twenty, and she looked five years older than little Bessie.

It was strange how plain the latter grew by contrast with her. How the little round face, with its olive skin, began to look beside that of the brilliant blonde. And then, too, Bessie's brown merino had various shiny spots, and though trim and neat, was a little dulled by age; while Miss Selina came to dinner every day in some new thing. Now she wore white, now blue, now lilac, even pink. Ribbons and lavenders, without losing a charm; for no contrast could hurt her complexion. She could chatter, too, about fashionable things, and also of frills and cuvaers which Bessie knew nothing of. She took me by storm, and I only knew that I had changed love without knowing it. He looked pale and offended, behind the green pease, one day at dinner. All the time Miss Selina was talking, but a little while I plucked up spirit. My aunt had been, so to speak, Harcissed for changing his mind at that day, and I believed that I had a right to change mine. Bessie was well enough in her way—a sweet little darling, but Miss Selina was a being of another order. She was not my fault that I adored her. I couldn't help it. Bessie had no business to look so glum. I had not pledged myself to her. Miss Selina thought before me sundry tender glances and whispers, thoughts more tender still, but I turned my back upon them.

I had a rival indeed. I had admired Bessie, but then I had not seen Selina. Therefore I leaned forward her, and asked her if I should pass the butter, in a manner which must have betrayed my down-fall. When I turned my head again Bessie was conversing with Janson Glosk. I was content; I did not desire to break the child's heart.

After that I devoted myself to Selina, who condescended to accept my attentions, and allowed me various favors as the turning of her music when she played, or the putting on of her shawl—who did not utterly refuse another glass of wine when I was always content ice-cream in my company, and quite forgot Bessie. She was, so said Miss Maydew, quite a commonplace little girl, whom was in the kitchen. I wondered at myself for my former infatuation. Spring gifted in a new dress, and I could see no harm, and winter came, bringing with it its peculiar gayeties, and by that time I hardly ever met Bessie except at meals. Then, only on Sunday nights, somebody kept my dinner warm and saved me a slab of pudding, and once, when I had a cold, Biddy brought a message to my room which said "Mrs. Beagle's compliments." Mrs. Beagle, bah! I knew Bessie sent it.

I remember that unfounds, because it helped to cure a cold I particularly wished to get rid of in order to take Selina Maydew out sleighing. I had come to a decision on the subject. My master's money was due the following day, and, come what might, I should dine at the best of my goddess in the form of a sleigh-ride. My stockings were growing airy, and I needed boots. I must do without these and a dozen other articles for the next two months in consequence, but what of that? Expensive though it might be, I could not forego the pleasure of a sleigh-ride with Miss Selina. On this! So having breakfasted beside me, the same robe over our knees, to have people whom we passed (for at nineteen who is not the observer and observee?) envy me as the handsomest and best-dressed girl in New York at my side. It was worth going barefoot for if need be.

Consequently, deifying consequences, I mentally resented my master's insolence to the last to me, and asked Miss Maydew, carelessly, as though sleighrides were everyday affairs with me, for the honor of her company. She accepted the invitation promptly, adding that she adored sleigh-rides; and I went to the seventh heaven of adoring swains at once.

I was too happy to rest all night; besides, a remembrance of the strict account demanded by grandfather of my expenditure set me to thinking. I fear I was divided between the merits of a woful fate of ridicule on account of myself as the leading beau so carried away by the discourse of the latest returned missionary, that in a moment of zeal I had almost put five-and-twenty dollars at the disposal of the heathen. Never having told the smallest fib before, I presume all my forces had been held in reserve to meet the case of Miss Maydew.

Alas! the next day dawned upon the beginning of my troubles; for the first time my grandfather's bailiff, red-nosed massive old man servant, appeared at ten o'clock on the first of the month.

Indeed, the time was past when the postman were paid without bringing a letter for my name. I grew restless after the first, anxious after the second, despairing after the third. I had not a cent in the world: I knew no one who would loan me money.

If by untoward chance my grandfather's remittance did not reach me I was disgraced forever; for had not the livery-stable man informed me that "Young gents nowadays is such cheats" that his terms were "Cash down at starting?"

I had a horrible apprehension at noon, when a small boy brought me a letter, which turned out to be a circular inviting my attention to "the best assortment of boots in the city;" and at night only the hope that my letter had been sent to my board-ing-house kept me from losing my senses. The whole post-mill. Alas! Biddy assured me "no letter hadn't come."

As I conversed upon the subject with that handmaiden, Thompson, the practical joker of our establishment, came in, and called to me—"Letter: bless me, Fitcairn, a letter, after a fortnight's grace five minutes after you left. Run back and get it before the old woman shuts up!"

At any other time I should have known I was being victimized to Thompson's sense of humor; but I was too much excited to understand him at the moment. Away I went again to find that I had been sold.

Upon the janitress was in the sanctum of the heads of the firm, whirling clouds of dust about with a broom; and when, after a fruitless search, I turned to depart again, the woman called to me:

"Mr. Fitcairn, come back—do. Here's some one left a watch. Whose is it?"

"Mr. Winder's," I said, as she put it in my hand, "and a valuable one too."

"I thought so," said the janitress. "Bless ye, it's well that old gentleman's head is glued on. If twasn't, he'd leave that behind him some night. Such carelessness! Now, how lucky you was here! I might ha' been suspected."

"Oh no," I said.

"You knows it's oh yes, Sir," said the old woman. "I should ha' been all of a tremble. Do'e now take it along with you, and leave it at Mr. Winder's; you pass his door."

I could hardly refuse; and in fact it seemed my only chance of a call at the office with Mr. Winder's watch in my pocket.

It was dark when I reached my residence, and found in the street a discussion being held among the vans with the air of a caged monkey.

"Mr. Winder at home?" said I.

"He isn't."

"Mrs. Winder?"

"No."

"Then I'd like to see the housekeeper."

"She's away—gone with missus. There's been an accident on the railroad, and they've had a telegraph that Masther Paul is hurt. The three have gone on to wherever it is an hour ago."

"I'm shocked to hear it. Mr. Winder's son is not badly hurt, I hope?"

"I don't know."

There was plainly no one to leave the watch with. This girl had by no means an honest countenance.

I walked away with Mr. Winder's watch still in my pocket, and paced the streets until the pangs of hunger superseded all others, and I went home.

The ministering household spirit had kept dinner warm for me, but I could not eat much. What I should do at the office next morning I could not answer. Shame, disgrace, contempt were before me, and when Selina with her sweetest smile whispered, "We shall meet at the ball, I hope, to-night!" I felt as though my senses were leaving me. Oh, I must gratefully to duty and confession on the morrow of all others—to what a pass had he brought me! I could not rest. I pleaded an engagement, and went out into the streets. I walked, and I ran, I intensely cold, but I did not feel it. I paced the flags, meditating on my position, until, in a narrow street, I trod on the lounging tail of one of those arched women just before me. She was a ragged creature and smelled of rum, and over her arm she held a skirt of brown cloth and a little flimsy shawl. Rising me for my mishap, she turned into a shop hard by and left me.

It was a pawnbroker's. She was going there, no doubt, to pawn those garments. I think the archangel must have had a glow about him. Perhaps I had seen him disguised in the shape of that tipsy woman. A desperate thought took possession of me—a thought I battled with in vain.

My quarterly allowance would surely come to-morrow. I should have the money to redeem it, and my aunt Mrs. Maydew's watch! Who would know it? I should have it safe again in twenty-four hours.

"Never," I said to myself in reply, "never!" and looked up at the golden balls again. Then I opened mechanically my great coat-pocket. It was morrow, and covered my face with both hands. Endure this for a mere whim, what folly! The watch would be safe at the office to-morrow than in my pocket overnight. I would do it. There was no harm. No one would ever guess what I had done; and there was nothing dishonest in either thought or act. I took a step toward the shop, paused, took another, pushed against the door, and found myself in the presence of a gentleman with a hooked nose. What passed between us I need not repeat; enough that in another minute after I emerged into the cold outer air, trembling and burning in with agitation, with a pawn ticket and five-and-twenty dollars in my pocket, while Mr. Winder's watch remained behind. Only until the morrow, the happy morrow, when I should glide over the snow with Selina Maydew by my side, and forget this latter. The delay of which had placed me in this plight.

"If there is any thing wrong in the matter," I said, as I gave the pawnbroker the ticket, "it is grandfather's fault, not mine."

The morning arose bright and clear, the snow glittered in the frosty air, at ten the sleigh was at the door, and Selina, cloaked and bonneted, ready to accompany me. I helped her in, and away we flew. It was glorious! My happiness was for a few hours unclouded. I forgot past troubles and cares for the future in her sweet society.

About three o'clock we stopped to lunch: Selina, as usual, did justice to the eatables. I was not like Byron. I enjoyed seeing a woman eat, and my romance did not vanish. What a glorious thing it would be, I thought, to have that face opposite me at table all the days of my life! Perhaps I should have said so, but that there was at that identical moment an interruption.

The waiter entered with some additional delicacy, and, setting it down, paused.

"Miss Maydew, mum?" he said.

her grandmother's sake.

"Yes," I replied, looking fierce, what right had he to know her name?

"A gentleman desires to know if he can come in?" he said; and he laid a card on the table.

"Cousin Charlie, I declare!" cried Miss Maydew. "Oh, of course."

A relative of hers. I prepared my blandest smiles, and in an instant a gentleman bowed into the apartment. He was older than I expected twenty-five. He wore a slight mustache and smelled of musk. Such gloves, such boots, such a tailor's fashion-plate of a fit to his coat. I hated him at once.

All the more that he took both Selina's hands in his and squeezed them, and returned my courteous bow with a nod, short and ungracious.

"To think of seeing you!" said Selina.

"Yes," drawled the cousin. "Very sing'lar. Fact is, I arrived last night, went to old Beagle's this morning, heard you'd come here, and took a sleigh and came after you."

"You good child!" said Miss Selina. "Oh, I forgot! Mr. Fitcairn, Mr. Charles Dondybrook."

We shook hands, with hate in our eyes.

"Sit up and take a bite," said Selina. "Waiter, a clean plate and glass—and another plate, and another bottle of Champagne. She gave the orders with an air, but I was content. She was acting the hostess at my board pro tem.

Cousin Charlie didn't "sit up." Also, good appetites must have run in the family. He did not condescend to talk to me, but he conversed with Selina in a manner many people have, on topics in which I could not take part, because I knew neither the names nor actors in them.

I glumly stared at the cloth, drank more wine than was good for me, and thought of pistols and bowie-knives. But the worst had not come. Then we had lunched Selina started up.

"Well, I must be off. Come back, Charlie, and you may ride with this cloak;" and, as he did so, there ensued a whispered confabulation. I suppose she had some shawl left in her, for she smiled those words with a blush as she turned toward me:

"Mr. Pitcairn, don't be angry with me if I go home in Charlie's sleigh. I haven't seen him for a year, you know; and I came with you."

Astounding! No, but I received it without showing my bleeding wounds to that puppy.

"Act as you please, Miss Maydew," I said—and she did.

Ten minutes after I paid my bill, and saw from the open door Cousin Charlie's turnout, gaily caparisoned, speeding over the snow, with Selina under the crimson-lined robe at his side.

I drove home—rather to the stables, whence I walked to my boarding-house. There Biddy met me.

"The letther ye was so anxious about come this artternoon," she said, and produced it, smelling of smoke, from her apron pocket. I took it joyfully, for Mr. Dondybrook began to have my entire conscience, and went with it to my room. It was grandfather's handwriting—his red seal and all; but why was it lighter than usual? Alas! I soon knew. Tearing it open I read as follows:

"APPENDALE, Pa.

"DEAR GRANDSON,—This comes hoping you are in the enjoyment of good health. Go to church regularly, and avoid balls. We are both well, but I have suffered further some heavy dispensations. Our best cow is dead; and last week a kitchen chimney fell, breaking the roof and filling the well with rubbish. It is a mercy no one was injured. As it will cost a great deal to repair them, and we have scarcely nest clothes—you have spent so much on your wardrobe—I, with regret, omit your quarterly remittance. However, next month I will send you thirty dollars at once to make amends. Write soon. Your grandmother sends her love.

"Yours, affectionately, SIMON PITCAIRN."

A great black gulf of despair and shame opened at my feet. I had cast a seat in Heaven away recently—miserable victim of circumstances that I was—I had stolen and pawned Mr. Winder's watch. What should I say—either about it or Miss Maydew? I commit suicide, or go into a cave and live in solitary misery, beating my breast, scattering ashes on my head, and crying "mea culpa?" Alas! even were a cave at hand Metropolitan police would ferret me out and consign me to the Tombs.

And good old grandma's heart would break, and grandfather would disown me, and my little world would look on me with scorn.

I was only nineteen, and I am not ashamed to own that I cried as a girl might when I thought of these things. At the juncture the bell rang, and I washed my face and went to dinner, for I had a fancy that any unusual conduct would bring premature detection upon my head. Selina was not there, and Mrs. Beagle informed us why.

"She's gone off somewhere with her sweet-heart," she said: "and a pretty couple they are! So glad to meet after such a long separation. Why, it's a year since they saw each other, and for all that an engagement—ever since she was fifteen. Ain't it romantic, Mr. Pitcairn?"

Romantic! Ah! I had another name for it—I, whom that girl had ruined.

I moped in the parlor a while. Then, as in any great trouble, a great gust of agony swept over me. If you have ever tested the fact, or will note it, you will know that mental or physical anguish always must come in regular pangs with so much time, more or less, between them. I wanted to stamp and rave. I could not endure my misery and what would surely come to me. I started from my seat, and went up to Thompson's room.

"Thompson," I said, "lend me your pistols."

"What for?" said Thompson.

"To shoot cats. I can't sleep for them," I said. And Thompson, with a joke about committing suicide, handed me his weapons.

Then I went up into my room, and wrote a long letter explaining what had happened, and inclosing the pawn-ticket; prayed all good and merciful Christians to believe me; directed the note to "Those who shall find my body;" and, taking the pistols, went down on the back porch, where no one ever came. There I intended to end my miserable life.

No need of great haste, the fierce, what right had he to know her name?

me. It uttered a prayer. I thought of the kind, pious old people at home. I wondered if dear little Susie would be sorry for me; if Mr. Winder and the others at the office would believe me. I wondered what heaven was like, and whether I should get there, and I listened to the church clock striking ten. I would give myself one hour of life; at eleven I would blow my brains out. I was awfully in earnest. Half the people who commit suicide do it. I fancy, with a hope of being stopped and restored to life in the very act. I did not. I would not live that hour over again for all the world could give. Eleven came at last. As the strokes died into silence I lifted the pistol to my ear, and said, solemnly: "Heaven have mercy on my sinful soul!" Then I should have fired, but a hand came on my shoulder, and dragged me backward.

Thompson had pounced upon me, other fellow-boarders were there, and Mrs. Beagle with them.

"No suicide, old fellow!" Thompson, pocketing his weapons. "She ain't worth it."

"Good fish in the sea as ever were caught," said Mrs. Beagle. "Cheer up, Mr. Pitcairn, do now!"

"Though heart-troubles are hard to bear," sighed Janson Glosk. "But I'd bleed myself to death and I'yes."

I struggled with them. I hated them for saving me. I hated more my own cowardice. I was about to kill myself for love of Selina Maydew.

I remember trying to jump over the balcony and standing naked, on a bitter winter's night, and then in bed in a darkened room with ice-water on my temples, and knew I had been ill.

I cast a glance about me. A dumpling of a figure, in a brown dress and white collar, swayed to and fro in a rocking-chair. It wore false shaps and the blackest of false hair. It was Bessie. I called her, and she came to me.

"Never mind now," she said, as she might a baby. "Of course, Miss Bessie, why not?"

"You haven't known any one for a week."

"Ah! I wish I had died and never known any one."

"Nonsense!"

"Bessie, you will know it is not nonsense soon. You don't guess what is before me."

"Oh, to get well and return to the office!"

"Never!"

She put her hips to my ear and whispered. "It's all right about the watch, Mr. Winder has it. Nobody knows any thing about where it was for twenty-four hours but me. You're safe. I couldn't let the watch's house—be disgraced, so I—arranged matters."

"Oh, Bessie, how—what—"

"Hush! I'll tell you again. I found your note. I read it while they took care of you. (I never told them what I read.) I took the watch out of the box, and twenty-seven dollars laid by for a new silk, and didn't mind lending it for the sake of—of one's house, you know. It's always been respectable."

I caught her hand and would have kissed it, but she took it away.

"God bless you," I said, "you've saved me!"

She tossed her head and put up her lip.

"Twas for every reason. I told you so. "Such a thing might do us harm, you know. Now keep quiet."

She left me, and I sank asleep praying for her.

After that I grew well rapidly, and went to my office again in a few days. But I loved her no more for the care I had taken of his valuable watch, and asked me "who the pretty little creature who brought it was—a sister—a cousin?—ah—a sweet-heart, now, Mr. Pitcairn?"

And I only blushed like a girl, and wished I had been more honest with Bessie.

But, alas! she was very cool and proud with me —never sat beside or talked to me. All her familiarity was gone now when I loved her so. It was hard to bear. For words can not tell how fond I had grown of her. At last the quarter came around, and I was able to pay Bessie her money.

I did it quite humbly and sadly, and she received the envelope with a little nod and "always pleased to oblige a friend."

"You must despise me very much," I said.

"Oh no; young men are young men, you know. I know you never intended to steal the watch." All spoken in such an icy tone, without a look at me.

I sat sadly looking at her. Now I had lost her I valued her. How beautiful her eyes were—so much deeper and clearer and more womanly than Miss Maydew's, whom they turned toward me —a little malice in them.

"Bessie, you know Miss Maydew is to be married to-day," I said, "to her cousin, Mr. Dondybrook?"

"Indeed!" said I.

"I am sorry to tell you ill news," said she.

"Ill news! You astonish me."

"Ah! well, we all thought you admired her, you know. Aunt told me to break it gently."

"Miss Maydew is a silly, heartless doll-baby," I said. "She is handsome, but I see no other claim in her."

"Fie!" said Bessie, "to speak so of the girl." But she looked more kindly at me.

"And even her beauty is not worth much," said I. "Give me an olive skin and brown eyes, and I never care to see a blonde."

Then she smiled outright.

"We all know little girls are prettiest," she said.

I arose and sat beside her on the sofa.

"Bessie," I said, "I can't think so. To me there is only one lovely woman in the world. Can you guess who that is?"

"How should I?" asked Bessie.

"You fool."

"Oh, I don't, Mr. Pitcairn!"

I stole my arm about her waist.

"Bessie," I said, "I love you better than my life. Can't you like me a little?"

Bessie looked down.

"Will you be my wife?" I asked, with a gasping effort.

"Your wife? It would be dangerous—you are so fickle. I'll hate a husband who cared for every new face. I don't consider myself a beauty, you know, Sir; but he, if I ever have one, must."

Bessie, there is nothing like you in the world to me."

"Ah, how long would it last?"

"Forever!"

"Half a day. Besides, poor Janson Glosk—"

"You don't love him, Bessie!"

"Love! It's not proper for a girl to love people; but I do admire his disposition—he's so constant."

"And you never can forgive me."

"There's nothing to forgive, I'm sure—a gentleman has a right to admire where he pleases."

But I saw a sly, shy look in her eyes, and caught her to my breast. She struggled like a frightened bird at first, and then purred next instant upon my shoulder, and I kissed her and called her mine.

So we were married, after some waiting for interest of money, and bitter times; and I am rich now and prosperous, and she has been my wife nearly years. I will say only the other day she came to me and perfected upon my knee in her mannerly cap, put her rosy, dimpled face close to mine, and made a confession.

"Do you remember long ago, Ned, the affair of Mr. Winder's watch?"

"Can I forget it, Bessie, and from what you saved me?"

"Well, Ned, I told you then I did for the sake of aunt's boarding-house. That was all my stupid pride. I did it for love of you, for I loved you dearly all along, Ned, dearest, Ned!"

All I hadn't known it from the first. But I didn't tell her so. I only kissed her.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A PERSECUTED WATCHMAN.—A man was sentenced to four years' imprisonment for simply keeping watch and ward of stolen property.

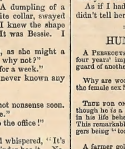
Why are woolen ships so compared with iron-clads of the female sex?—Because they're the weaker vessels.

TURF FOR ONE.—A traveler announces as a fact and though he is a "traveler," we believe him) that he once in his life bought a horse without a gentleman approached his remarkable occurrence happened as soon—the purchase being "by the horse" was passed to another gentleman.

A farmer going to get his grist ground at a mill, borrowed a bag of one of his neighbors. The poor man was much grieved when he returned, and the bag with him; he was drowned. When the melancholy news was brought to his wife, she cried out: "My gracious, what a fuss there'll be about that bag!"

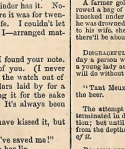
DISGRACEFUL CONDUCT OF A "GENTLEMAN."—Yesterday a gentleman who had hired himself a gentleman approached a young lady and took the liberties. What the poor girl said to him without it we are not cognizant of.

"TANT MIEUX," as the publican said when he watered the beer.



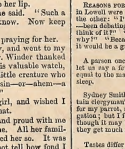
The attempt to lay the Atlantic cable has for a time terminated in failure. We have witnessed the terminations; but until they succeed in fishing the cable up again from the depths of ocean we can not hope to see the "end of it.

REASONS FOR NOT JOINING THE CHURCH.—Two lawyers in Vicksburg were overheard a short time since on the one said to the other: "I've a notion to join Rev. Mr. ——'s church next Sunday, and hear what he has to preach." "What do you think of it?" "Wouldn't do it," said the other. "Well, why?" "Why, because there is no profitable good, while it would be a great injury to the church."



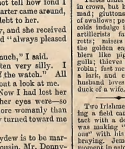
A person once prefaced his sermon with, "My friends, let us have a few remarks before we begin." This is about equal to the man who took a short nap before he went to sleep.

Sydney Smith being one day asked his opinion of a certain clergyman's sermon, replied, "Just as I chose biscuit for my lunch, I took a sermon from the pile for his congregation; but I fancy he chews all the flavor out of it: and though he may be considered easy to digest, I doubt if they get much nourishment from it."



Tastes differ with regard to birds. The Indian delights in crows, but hates the thrush; some females are raven mad; gluttons are fond of cockney sparrows; people indulge in hawks; scribblers have a penchant for quills; nature cultivates the golden robin; poets adore blue pigeons and thirsty souls for robin; fast men glory in a hawk, and every husband loves his little stock of a wife.

THE TRIBUNE IN CROSSING a field came in contact with a donkey that was making "day like-ass" with his musical braying. Jimmy stood a moment in mixed wonder, but turning to Ted, who seemed to sustain comparison with the song as to himself, remarked, "I'll be a fine large ear that bird has for music, will it not? sure he's got an awful throat!"



A friend remarking to Charles Lamb, at an evening party at Lady Dacre's, that Miss A—— mangled the English language out of the former reptile], "Look at her mouth, my dear fellow! How can you expect a woman with such an ill-formed mouth to utter well-formed sentences?"

"So, poor Miss Prim is dead at last, then Sloper remarked to Wilmore. "Oh yes, poor critter; she couldn't bear to hear how Dr. Squibbs was a settling up to Widow Wimpole; so she just died with grief, and sunk under it." "Poor, unfort'nate creetur!" said the old maid. "How does any one sink?"

Why is love like a duck's foot?—Because it is the webbed union under the breast.

"STEAM DEFENDER.—At a railway station an old lady said to a very pompous-looking gentleman who was talking about steam communication.—"Pray, Sir, what is steam?" "Steam, ma'am, is, ah!—steam is, ah! ah! steam is—steam!" "I know that chap couldn't tell ye," said a rough-looking fellow standing by. "But steam is a bucket of water in a tremendous perspiration."

At a recent church fair held in the vicinity of Taunton, a set of Copper's Works was presented to the individual who should make a certain set of conundrums. The winner received a set of wooden pails.

The Empress Eugenie climbed the Right on the 21st ultimo. On her return she declared herself to be Rightly tired out.

AN AWKWARD COMPLIMENT.—A wedding breakfast was given at which a number of ladies were invited. Among the eldest being the bride, when a neighbor, a young gentleman, who was invited to attend, remarked, "I no doubt, be ought to say something smart and complimentary to the accomplished old lady." Accordingly, on his leaving he paid the price of the batch: "The countenances of the bride smartest ladies, so many in baughan, were awful.

Which are the lightest men—Scotchmen, Irishmen, or Englishmen?—In Ireland there are none of Cork; in the land men of Ayr (air); but in England, upon the Thames, all men are watermen.

In spite of all that Puritanical people say against dancing, it is unquestionably a merry-torious arrangement.

"You would be very pretty indeed," said a gentleman, patronizingly, to a young lady, "if your eyes were only a little larger." "My eyes may be very small, Sir, but such organs as you don't fill them."

A father once visited dear Charley's instructor.

Who was noted for being a stern man of vigilance.

"Why! does not the lad in consequence of his crime?"

"Because," said the master, "he's wanting in diligence."

A learned coroner being asked how he accounted for the great mortality in Paris, replied exclaimed: "I can not tell; people seem to die this year that never died before."

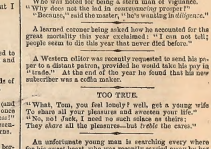
A Western editor was recently requested to send his prices for an advertisement, which he replied he would be glad to trade." At the end of the year he found that his new subscriber was a cotton factor.

TOO TRUE.

"What, Tom, you feel lonely? well, get a young wife To share all your pleasures and sweeten your life." "Why, no, not feel lonely, for such ideas are dead, They share all the pleasures—but treble the cares."

An unfortunate young man is searching every where for his sweet-heart, who was recently carried away by her feelings.

"YOUR FARE, MISS?"—A young lady from the rural district of Hoosierdom lately visited Chicago with her beau. Getting into a city railroad car for the first time, she took her seat, while her lover paused alongside on the platform with the driver. Very soon the conductor began to collect fares, and approaching the rustic maiden, he said, "Your fare, miss?" The Hoosier rose—but allowed a delicate pink to manifest itself upon her cheeks, and looked down in soft confusion. The conductor was rather astonished at this, but repeated in rather a louder tone, "Your fare, miss?" This time the pink deepened to carnation as she timidly looked up, and said, "Why, if I am check-rein, you hadn't ought to say it out loud above fifth!"



At what time of life may a man be said to belong to the vegetable kingdom?—When long experience has made him sage.

Brings has a great faculty for getting things cheap. The other day he met a poor relation before George Tree Inn? "Where thine was," said the Quaker, "before Harry Tudor's time. Now," added the Quaker, "pray let me see thine a question—Where was Jacob going when he was turned his years of age? Learn then tell that?" "No, nor you either," said the clergyman. "Yes, I can," replied the Quaker." He was going into his eleventh year."

The Irish statute-book opens characteristically with "An Act that the King's officers may travel by and from place to another within the land of Ireland."

A wave on which many a poor fellow has been carried away is the wave of a face-edged comfortable handkerchief.

If, when you are scourged, the rod is the handle of a pretty woman, kiss it religiously.

VERY INGENIOUS.

CHAPTER LIV.

HOW THE EARL SPED IN HIS WOOING.

It was a hurried, uncomfortable afternoon at Castletowers, and Signor Colonna's visitor had brought nothing but confusion to the house. The news was really important news to those whom it concerned; but there was nothing which Lady Castletowers disliked so much as excitement, nothing in her eyes so undignified as haste, and she was therefore not a little displeased by the sudden breaking up of her party. It was nothing to her that Garibaldi was in occupation of Palermo. It was nothing to her that an armistice had been concluded between the Neapolitan Government, or that the army would be likely to march next in the direction of Messina. She only knew that the Walkinghams and Miss Hatherton were coming to dine with her that very day; that Signor Montecucculi would make one too many at the table; and that the departure of the Colonnas immediately after dinner would spoil the evening.

In the mean while Signor Colonna was deep in consultation with the new-comer; Olimpia, assisted by one of the maids, was busily unlocking her father's books and papers; the Earl was wandering disconsolately to and fro, seeking his opportunity; and Sexton Trefalden, summoned by his swiftest thorough-bred, was galloping toward the hills, determined to leave a card there for his friend, and not to come back till the first dinner-bell should be ringing.

At four o'clock the afternoon wore on, the Earl grew tired of waiting about the drawing-rooms and staircase, and sought Olimpia in her father's private study. There he found her, not in Colonna's own den, but in the room immediately beneath it, kneeling before a huge army trunk more than half filled with pamphlets, letters, dispatches, maps, and documentary lumber of every description. Many books and papers littered the floor and table, and these the servant was busting previous to their being sorted and tied up by Miss Colonna.

"Can I be of any service?" asked the Earl, as he peeped in through the half-opened door.

Olimpia looked up with a pleasant smile.

"Are you really in want of something to do?" said she.

"Greatly."

"Then you may help to sort these papers. Among them are some dozens of my father's reports. You can arrange those according to date, and tie them up in parcels of about eighteen or twenty."

The Earl set about his task with much seeming alacrity.

"What, Monte cucculi a grudge for this," he said, presently. "Who would have thought this morning at breakfast that you would strike your tents and fly away into the ghostly realms described before night?"

"Who would have thought that we should have such glorious cause for breaking up our camp?" retorted Olimpia, with enthusiasm.

"Not me, indeed. And yet I wish the news had not traveled quite so quickly."

"Good news can not fly too fast," replied Olimpia. "I can not bring myself to trust myself to think what the next may be."

"At least, do not hope too much."

"Nay, I have despended hope enough. Hope has been for so many years a forbidden luxury that I feel as if I could not now drink of it too deeply. And things, I repeat, look so bright that I believe that the hour is come at last, and that miracles will be accomplished within the next few months."

The Earl, thinking more of his own hopes and fears at that moment than of Italy or the Italians, wished with all his heart that a miracle could be accomplished then and there for the translation of the house-maid to any convenient planet.

"I should not be surprised," continued Olimpia, "if by this time to-morrow the Garibaldi men in Messina—or that he had crossed the straits, and carried Naples by a coup de main."

"Do I," replied Castletowers, abstractedly.

And then for a few moments they were both silent. The rustle of their silence a ball rustled long and loudly in some part of the offices below.

"What ball is that?" asked the Earl, who had heard it thousands of times in the course of his house-life, and knew its import perfectly.

"It is my maid's ball, Mr. Castletowers," replied the house-maid.

"And what does it mean, then—the servants' ren?"

"Yes, my lord."

Olimpia took the Earl's little bait immediately.

"You need not mind the rest of those papers now, Jane," she said, good-naturedly. "Go down at once, and come back when you have had tea."

Whereupon the house-maid, duly grateful, left the room.

And now Lord Castletowers had only to speak. The coveted opportunity was his at last; but it was no sooner his than he lost his presence of mind, and found himself without a word to say.

Presently Olimpia looked up, and spoke again.

"How hard a thing it is," said she, "to be a woman—a mere woman! How hard to sit down tamely, day after day, listening to the echoes of the battle-field—listening and waiting!"

"I am very glad you are listening from so safe a distance."

"And I pray that that distance may soon be lessened," she retorted, quickly. "We shall undoubtedly go to Genoa in the course of the next fortnight; and if my father crosses to Sicily, I do not mean to be left behind."

"But the Mediterranean swarms with Neapolitan war-steamers!" exclaimed the Earl.

Olimpia smiled.

"Besides, of what service could you be when there? You will perhaps say that you can do hospital work; but the hospitals do not want you. Ten per cent. of our volunteers are medical men. And I will venture to say that every woman in Sicily is a willing nurse."

"I would do any work that my head or hands could be trusted to perform," said he; "if—whether it were at the desk or the bedside. Oh that I could give my blood for the cause!"

Then for the first time replied the Earl, "but women the texts that make death sweet, and the smiles that make victory worth achieving."

Olimpia's lip curled scornfully.

"Do women have noble ends at stake than women's smiles!" said she.

The Earl was in despair. Nothing that he had ever planned or fixed fancy with Miss Colonna, and all this time the minutes were slipping away—the precious minutes for which there would be no return.

"True friend to the cause as I am, Olimpia," said he, desperately, "if I were to go out, it would be as much for myself as for the sake of your country; but I hope you would not scorn my error for that reason."

Miss Colonna was taken by surprise. She had never been blind to the young man's admiration, but had so strongly discouraged it for so long, she had taken it for granted that he would not venture on a declaration. Even now, though his words could have but one possible bear on other interpretation, she determined to put the thing aside and prevent him, if possible, from speaking more plainly. And with this end in view she strategically when he called her by her name!

"Yours is almost the only word we should decline to insist on any terms, Lord Castletowers," she replied, gravely. "You are an only son, and the sole inheritor of a noble name. Your duties lie here."

"You would not think thus if I were an Italian?"

"Certainly not. I should then say that your first duty was to your country."

The Earl came a little before her, pale and earnest, and not to be turned from his purpose.

"Hear me, Olimpia," he said, passionately. "I love you, and you know it. I love you. I have loved you for more than four years. I will not ask that I have loved in vain. If I had hoped, I should not, perhaps, have kept silence so long; but I may have thought that you read my secret, and that I should be spared the more eloquently than words. I know how heavy the chances are against me—I have weighed them all, long since. I know that he who would aspire to your hand must love your Italy as if he were a son of the soil, must throw in his fortunes with her fortunes, and perceive through his devotion to her cause. I also know that the man who had done all this would only have fulfilled the barest conditions of admission which the humblest red-shirt in Garibaldi's wake would stand a better chance than himself. Am I not right?"

"Perfectly; but—"

"Do not say yet, I implore you! You say that I have duties here. It is true; and I am prepared to fulfill them to the utmost. I will sell this house and all the income on my mother for her life. All else that is mine, land, revenue, strength of body and will, personal influence, life itself, shall be Italy's. Your country shall be my country—your people my people—your God my God. Olimpia, I repeat, except that I love you? That, deeply and dearly as I love you now, I believe from my soul I shall love you better and better every day. In my eyes you will never be less young or less beautiful. Should sorrow or sickness come upon you, I will do all that man can do to console and comfort you. If you are in peril, I will die defending you. The love of my youth will be the love of my age; and I will be to you, as now, Olimpia, whether you reject or accept me, that you will be to me, the hour!"

He paused. His manner, even more than his words, had been intense and eager, and now that the passionate appeal was all poured out, he waited for his sentence.

And Olimpia? Did she listen unmoved? She never had to the end. She could not quite control the color that came and went, or the tears that would not be stayed. One by one, as he pleaded, they more earnest, they had slipped slowly over the dark lashes and down the pale cheek, and she, who had never seen her shed a tear before, believed for one wild moment that his cause was won.

Her first words undeceived him.

"I am very sorry for this, Lord Castletowers," she said; and her voice, which was a little remissive at first, became steady as she went on. "I would have given much that these words had never been spoken: for they are spoken in vain. I believe that you have sincerely, I believe that I have never been so well loved—I shall never be so well loved again: but—I can not marry you."

"You will, at least, give me a reason!"

"To what end? Do not you ought to anticipate it? Do not ask it, my lord. Nothing that I could tell, nothing that you could say, would alter my decision."

The Earl turned his face aside.

"This is cruel," he said. "I have not deserved it."

"Heaven knows that I do not mean it so," replied Olimpia, quickly. "I should be more or less than woman if I did not regret the loss of such a heart as yours."

"You have not lost it, Olimpia," he replied, brokenly. "You will never lose it. With me, once is always."

She clasped her hands together, like one in pain.

"Oh that it were not so!" she exclaimed. "Are you, then, sorry for me?"

"Bitterly—bitterly!"

"And yet you can not love me?"

Olimpia was silent.

Again the blood flushed upon him—again he broke into passionate pleading.

"I used to think once—madly, presumptuously, if you will—that you might learn to be indifferent to me as you have been for late. Was I mistaken in so thinking? Or is it possible that I have done any thing to lessen your regard? Have I ever offended you? Or pained you? Or manifested my admiration too openly?"

"Never—never."

"Then, why can never care for me? For Heaven's sake, tell me this before we part?"

Olimpia became ashy pale, and leaned upon the table as if her strength were failing her.

"Lord Castletowers," she said, slowly, "you have no right to press me thus."

"Nor have you the arrogance of my whole life is at stake? Give me but the benefit of a hope and I will be silent!"

"I can not."

The Earl put his hand to his forehead in a bewildered way.

"I don't seem as if I could believe it," he said. "But—if I only knew why, perhaps it would not be so hard to bear."

Miss Colonna looked down, and for some moments neither spoke nor stirred. At length she said:

"I will tell you why, Lord Castletowers, if you must know. It is possible that I may never marry. And it is possible that I may be called upon to decide for Italy than yourself. Are you satisfied?"

The young man could not trust himself to speak. He only looked at her; and a dark expression came into his face—an expression as Olimpia had never seen it wear till that moment.

"Farewell," he said, almost imploringly, and put out her hand.

"Farewell," he replied, and, having held it for a moment coldly, drew back, disregard it gently and said no more.

She remembered afterward how cold her own hand was, and how dry and hot was the palm in which it rested.

But a few moments later and she was kneeling by her bedside in her own fur-navy chamber, silent and self-reliant no longer, but wringing her hands with a woman's passionate sorrow, and crying aloud:

"Oh that he could have looked into my heart—that he could only have known how I love him!"

CHAPTER LV.

AT ARM'S-LENGTH.

There was no superfluous guest at Lady Castletower's table after all; for Miss Colonna excused herself on the plea of severe headache, and Signor Montecucculi opportunely filled her place. But the dinner proved an effect manque, notwithstanding. The Earl, though, as host, he strove to do his best, played the part languidly, and was bitterly sad at heart. Saxon, who had come in expecting to find the Grand Canal five minutes before the dinner was served, looked weary and disappointed. Montecucculi was forever gazing at Giulio Colonna, full of Italian politics, was indisposed for conversation. And so, what with Lady Castletowers's displeasure, with that vague sense of discomfort inseparable from any kind of parting or removal, a general dreariness pervaded the table from the outset.

In the mean while Colonna, sitting at Lady Castletowers's right hand, had been entertaining the non-fulfillment of certain of his plans.

"I had hoped," he said, in a low tone, "that something would have come of it ere this."

"And I had hoped it, too, dear friend—for your sake," replied Lady Castletowers, benevolently.

"I had made certain that, knowing how unexpectedly we are called away, he would have spoken plainly ere the time for coming. Instead of his horse quite early, and has been in the saddle all day."

"That looks strange!"

"Very strange. I wish to Heaven we could have remained in Town one week longer!"

"But it is not too late to reverse your plans," Colonna shook his head.

"I can not persuade them," he said, "that I can reverse the order of the planets."

"Then leave Olimpia with me. She is not fit to go up to your children's evening."

"Thanks—I had already thought of that; but she is determined to accompany me."

To which the Countess, who was much more deeply interested in procuring Miss Hatherton's fortune for her son than in securing a wealthy bridegroom for the daughter of her friend, replied, "I am sorry, amico," and transferred her conversation to Mr. Walkingham.

But Colonna had not yet played his last card. When the ladies retired he took the vacant seat at Saxon's right hand, and said:

"Ours is an abrupt departure, Mr. Trefalden; but I trust we shall see you in London."

Saxon bowed, and murmured something about obligation and kindness.

"You are yourself returning to town, I understand, the day after to-morrow."

Saxon believed he was.

"Then you must promise to come and see us. You will find us, for at least the next fortnight, at the Portland Hotel; but after that time we shall probably be bending our steps toward Italy."

Saxon bowed again, and passed the decanter. Colonna began to see that there was something wrong.

"When friends wish to insure a meeting," said he—"and we are friends, I trust, Mr. Trefalden—their best plan is to make a definite appointment. Will you dine with us on Thursday at our hotel?"

"I am afraid—" began Saxon.

"Nay, that is an ominous beginning."

"I have been so long away from town, continued the other, making man, somewhat awkwardly, "and shall have so many claims upon my time for the next few weeks, that I fear I must make no engagements."

Giulio Colonna was utterly confounded. But yesterday, and this quiet gentleman would have grasped at any straw of invitation that might have brought him nearer to Olimpia; and now—Was he drawing off? Was he offended? He laid his hand on Saxon's arm, and, bending his most gracious smile upon him, said:

"I will not part from you thus, my dear Sir. Those who serve my country serve me; and you have been so munificent a benefactor to one cause that you have earned my your debtor for life. I will not, therefore, suffer you to drop away into the matter-ruled where acquaintanceship. I look upon you as a friend, and as a friend you must promise to break bread with me before I leave England."

Saxon would have given the best thoroughbred in his stables—nay, every horse that he possessed, in the mill pound—to escape the bargain!—only to know at that moment how the Earl had prospered in his wooing. Being ignorant, however, on this point, he made the best reply he could under the circumstances.

"I am sorry to refuse," he said, "Signor Colonna," he said, bluntly, "At all events, I will call upon you at your hotel; but until I know how I am situated with—with regard to other friends—I can say nothing more positive."

"Then I suppose I must try to be content," replied the Italian, somewhat dryly. And that Saxon Trefalden was on his guard, and holding him at arm's-length, and in his heart he cursed his advance more than ever, Giulio saw it was at work against him.

Later in the evening, when they were all come, and Lady Castletowers had retired, and Saxon remained the only guest in the house, the two young men came down to the smoking saloon—a large, comfortable room adjoining the library, and opening upon the same quiet garden.

"Well?" exclaimed Saxon, eagerly. "What speed?"

The Earl closed the door before replying; and then his answer was significant enough.

"None."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean, Trefalden, that the sooner that cloth is flowed we are on the high seas the better pleased I shall be. She has refused me."

Despite the claims of friendship and his own circumstances resolves Saxon's heart gave a joyous bound.

"Refused you!" he said. "On what grounds?"

The Earl threw himself into a chair.

"On patriotic grounds," he replied, gloomily. "Do you mean because you are English?"

"No; not because I am English, but because I am a man. I would have given her hand in marriage it must be to a man who can 'do more for Italy' than Garvey or myself."

"Do more for Italy!" repeated Saxon, slowly.

"Ay; did you know what she meant? Why, man, it means that Olimpia Colonna, with all her beauty, purity, and pride of birth, will some day be called upon to sell herself, wrong her husband, and sacrifice me—for her country's sake! If I were as rich as you are she would marry me. If you were to propose to her to-morrow she would marry you. If you were old, ugly, ignorant—any thing, in short, save a Bourbon or a Hapsburg—she would gladly marry you all the same. And yet she loves me!"

"Are you sure of that?"

"I am as certain of it as that she lives and breathes."

"Did—did she admit it?"

"No; but she could not deny it. Besides I saw it—felt it. There are times when all men are enlightened—and I was enlightened then."

Saxon was silent.

"And this is patriotism!" ejaculated Castletowers, bitterly. "I have heard it said that virtues carried to excess become vices; but till now I never believed it. Not for the Italian cause . . . I have been a true friend to it, Trefalden—a true and earnest friend, as you well know; but never—never like this!"

And he ground the words out slowly between his teeth as if he meant them.

After this they sat together with books and maps before them, planning many things, and talking far into the night.

CHAPTER LVI.

GOING TO NORWAY.

"We are going to Norway—Castletowers and I!"

The words were in Saxon's mouth all day long, and Saxon himself was living in a fever of preparation. The men at the Exechequ took a good deal of languid interest in his doings, and were lavish of advice in the matter of Norwegian travel—especially those who had never crossed the Skager Rak in their lives. And Saxon was grateful for it all, loving every thing that every body recommended, and stocking himself in the wildest way with meat-essences, hermetically-preserved game and fish, solid soups, ship's biscuit, wines, spirits and liqueurs, fishing-tackle, wading-boots, patent tents, polyglott washing-books, Swedish and Norwegian grammars, dictionaries, and vocabularies, pocket-telescopes, pocket-microscopes, pocket-revolvers, waterproof clothing, and a thousand other snares of the like nature. Then, besides all these, he ordered a couple of nautical suits, a gorgeously-log-book bound in scarlet morocco, and secured by a Chubb's lock; for Saxon had scorned to buy a ship ready-made but bought it, paid for it, christened it, and now meant to play the part of yacht owner thereof, under the due jurisdiction of a competent master.

In all this Mr. Lawrence Greatorex had made himself particularly useful and obliging, having taken the trouble to go down with Saxon to Portsmouth for the purpose of introducing him to a ship-building acquaintance who happened, luckily, to be able to help them to the very thing of which they were in search. It was a pretty boat enough, handy and graceful as an American beauty; and as her owner was anxious to sell and Saxon eager to buy, the bargain was soon concluded.

Then came the hiring of a competent master and crew, and the shipping of sea-going paraphernalia generally, which, in the trip round the Isle of Wight, and all the rest of those delightfully business-like excursions which take place on board of yachting seem so much like earnest. And throughout the whole of this time Mr. Greatorex—who, by the bye, detested sea, really grateful to his benefactor, and anxious to serve him in any way in his power, made the mysteries of a certain modest loan—posted backward and forward between London and Portsmouth, helped Saxon through innumerable commercial difficulties, and proved himself an invaluable adviser.

It was a busy time for Saxon. He had no leisure for regrets, and perhaps no overwhelming inclination to indulge in them either. What was his disappointment, after all, compared with the Earl's? A mere scratch under a deep and deadly wound. Castletowers had loved Olimpia Colonna for the long years—Saxon had been her slave for about as many weeks. Castletowers had confessed to him, in a manly, quiet way, and without the slightest semblance of affectation, that he believed he should never love any other woman—Saxon had no such conviction; but felt, on the contrary, that the best love of his life was yet to come. All these things considered, he was so grieved for his friend that he came to be almost ashamed of his own trouble—which somewhat ashamed to regard his disappointment in the light of a trouble. Castletowers had been cared for him. She had cared for nothing but his wealth; and only for that on account of Imily. Miss Hutchinson might be a fine woman in the literal truth that day when she compared him to the goose that laid the golden eggs. It was a humiliating truth; but, after all, it was not well for the goose to have escaped with only the loss of an egg or two? So Saxon tried to be philosophical, and his sorrow was further hurried on the yachting preparations with a will; and set himself to effect Olimpia's beautiful image from his heart as rapidly as possible.

At last all was ready. The yacht rode lightly at anchor in Portsmouth harbor, and nothing but her owner and master to embark; and Saxon, having made his last round of inspection and seen that every thing was in order, from the glittering swivel-gun on the foredeck to the no less brilliant pots and pans in the caboose, was speeding up to London, to spend his last evening with William Trefalden.

"Isn't she a little beauty, treatorex?" said he.

It was the first word that had been spoken since they left Portsmouth.

"I'll tell you what it is, my dear boy," replied the banker, with that engaging familiarity to which so many of the West End aristocracy had the bad taste to object; "the Alcola is just the tastiest and trimmest little craft that ever scudded across the sea. If she had been built for you you could not have had a better fit."

"I wonder what Castletowers will say when he sees her?"

"If he has but half the taste I give him credit for he will envy you her," replied Mr. Greatorex.

"In London?" said go down together. We hope to weigh anchor about three o'clock in the afternoon."

"And you will be away—how long?"

"From two to three months."

Mr. Greatorex looked thoughtful, and lit a cigar.

"If I can be useful to you while you are out there, Trefalden, you know you may command me," said he. "I mean if you have any letters or shares that you want looked after, or any interest got in."

"Thank you very much," replied Saxon; "but my cousin manages all those things for me."

"Humph! And you have no other lawyer?"

"Of course not."

"Would you think it impertinent if I ask how he has disposed of your property? Understand, my dear boy, that I don't want you to tell me if you had rather not; but I should like to know that Mr. Trefalden of Chancery Lane has done the best he can for you."

"Oh, you may take that for granted," said Saxon, warmly.

"We take nothing for granted, east of Temple Bar," replied Greatorex, drily.

But of this observation his companion took no notice.

"More than half of my money was left in the Bank of England," said he, "in Government stock."

"Safe; but only three per cent.," remarked the banker.

"And the rest is invested in—in a company."

"In what company?" asked Greatorex, quickly.

"Ah, that I may not tell you. It's a secret at present."

The banker looked very grave.

"I am sorry for that," he said.

"Don't be sorry. It's a magnificent enterprise—the grandest thing of the present half century, and a certain success. You'll hear all about it before long."

"Not the South Australian diamond mines, I hope?"

"No, no."

"Did Mr. Trefalden advise the investment?"

"Yes; and has put all his own money into it as well."

"That looks as if he had some faith in it."

"He has perfect faith in it. Grim is the company's lawyer, you see, and knows all about it."

"And who are the directors?"

"Well, I believe I'm one of them," laughed Saxon.

"And the rest?"

"I haven't the slightest idea."

"But you have met them on board-days?"

"Never. I don't think there have been any board-days yet awhile."

The banker shook his head.

"I don't like it," said he. "I tell you frankly, my dear boy, I don't like it."

"I really see no reason why you should dislike it," replied Saxon.

Mr. Greatorex smoked for some time in silence, and made no reply. After that the conversation went on in a lively, and then was talked about Norway, and salmon-fishing, and a thousand other topics connected with the trip that they should make, and the parting, on the platform of the London terminus.

"I will, upon my soul, Trefalden, that you would intrust me with the name of that company," said the banker, earnestly.

"I can not."

"It would enable me to keep an eye on your interests while you are away."

"You are very kind," replied Saxon; "but I have promised to keep the secret faithfully, and I mean to do so. Besides, I have absolute confidence in my cousin's discretion."

The City man shrugged his shoulders significantly.

"To tell you the blunt truth, my dear fellow," said he, "I would not trust William Trefalden one inch further than I could see him—and I can—don't look at me as if I were proposing to blow up the Houses of Parliament. It is a rude thing to say, I know; but I am a plain-spoken man living who is of that opinion. I don't like William Trefalden. Perhaps you will say that I have good reason for disliking him—and so I have; but that is not it. I am not speaking now from my prejudices, but through my regard for you. You did a very foolish thing when, in spite of your cousin; and I should rejoice to do something for you in return."

"Also in spite of my cousin, I suppose," replied Saxon, half in jest, and more than half in anger. "Well, I forgive you, Greatorex. You mean well, I am sure; but you can not serve me in this matter—unless by dismissing an unjust prejudice from your mind."

"Wilful man—et cetera! Well, then, Trefalden, good-by, and bon voyage."

"Good-by, Greatorex."

And so they parted.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

AUTUMN has come with bright days and brighter faces. Broadway is gay with fair creatures returned from the summer-crowded watering-places. To be sure they must go to Saratoga, or Newport, or Long Branch for "the season;" but even plenty of Congress water or surf-bathing does not compensate for the discomfort of living in trunks' in a crowded hotel, and a fashionable bonnet. And now that fashion allows them to return, they accept the new opportunity with delight. Once more the closets, apartments and spacious wardrobes at home, but especially yield to the fascinations of a promenade down Broadway. One thing, however, is to be borne in mind. It is

THE EMPTIE BOSKET.—In huge crown, small brim, and straight, uncertain arm are denominated "ugly." Be sure they are a little Quakerish, and may make the young lady look like Mother Shipton. The very thing, and the "Empire" will soon be "all the rage."

But other changes will follow, as a frequent of conversation, soliloquy, and dialogue. Thus:

PLACE—Academy of Music. TIME—Intermission between the acts.

LADY IN DRAB. "How in the world are we ever going to get those horrid fat gentlemen out?"

LADY IN BLUE. "Well, now, I think they are sweet. I see such a beauty in Broadway to-day!"

LADY IN DRAB. "But our waterfall! What shall we do with that?"

LADY IN BLUE. "Ah! don't you know? the style is going to change—waterfalls are all to hang down, and look below, and the hat fits on just between the long!"

ATTENDANT (not comprehending). "Do you remove the waterfall altogether and pack it away until to fashion comes?"

LADY IN BLUE (indignantly). "You are—"

Curtain rises, and dollars fasting through the air arrest her attention.

A PRIVATE word to you, fair reader:

WHITTAKER'S SCHOOL AND ARTIFICIAL.—The discolours her hair made that the chignon designion may be had direct! If the back hair is dressed high, it is the work of art bought at the shop, and not the product and growth of the scissors; if short, and curled naturally in a thin sticking out, then it may be understood that the coiffure is the genuine property of those on whose head it figures.

Fitzsip up the hair a little after your waterfall is arranged, and you will never suffer from false imputation respecting it.

One of our fashionable hair-dressers tells this good story:

An old Quaker lady was standing at her counter one day, when a gay young girl came in to engage a headdress for the evening. She gave her order hurriedly, saying that she wanted a half dozen "curls," and a "butterfly" on top, a "circlone" or "waterfall" at the back, with plenty of "puffs," "curls," and ending with an injunction to send along any quantity of "curls," "ones," and "clusters."

"Poor child!" said the dear old lady, compassionately, looking after her as she departed. "What a pity she has lost her mind!"

Those who have a taste for the fine arts will be interested in the following fact:

Church, the artist, is said to be engaged in painting a waterfall which will be a companion piece to his Niagara way.

Nothing is more charming than to see the little home pets tastefully dressed; and good mothers are always watching for something neat and pretty.

A fine, white dress, elaborately ornamented with needlework, is really the prettiest dress a little girl can wear. Add to this a sash, with shoulder-knots of broad, rich ribbon, and fancy-colored garters, and the little lady is prepossessing in any dress.

But for everyday wear low necks and short sleeves for little girls are very pretty. High dresses are made of sacked apron, or high, gored apron and loo-necked dress-body, together with the fashionable Zouave or Garibaldi jackets, divide the honors about equally for ordinary wear, and are the most generous which formerly endangered the health of the little ones.

Apropos to the following:

SUNBURNS.—A fine-looking man of noble physique, and clad in cool drapery, and round his head, was walking, and the other day with his little three-year-old daughter—a two-forked child, with bare neck and arms, and Morocco slippers. A neighbor, meeting them, began to ask with great appearance of interest for the father's health, when:

"But I'm glad your little one does not inherit your delicate constitution."

"Feeble constitution!" exclaimed the astonished parent. "Why, I was never sick a day in my life; while, as for my daughter, we fear she has her mother's consumptive tendencies."

"Indeed," replied his friend, with a sly twinkle of the eye, "I should have thought you meant to protect yours from the cold, while she goes bare-necked, and in pinpointed shoes. I didn't suppose you had inherited the mother's consumptive tendencies and not she."

When we ourselves luxuriate in something nice we like to eat our friends with us to enjoy the scene. The recipe we give below is not one of those untried and worthless ones which are constantly floating through the newspapers. Our method of preparing the beverage to which we allude is known to us, and we know it is, why,—your taste is different from ours. We eat it

HOME CAFÉ DAUNOISE.—Take some cold coffee, which, perchance, has been left over from breakfast, and put it with milk in proportions to suit your taste. Tea is pur or bad substitute. Then sweeten add a couple of cold boiled eggs, a table-spoonful—or more if you like—of sugar, and a little cold fat pork cut fine. Season with pepper and salt, with to serve it add some pieces of broken ice. This makes a delicious drink. We are to feel particularly thankful to and lively, it has a wonderful effect.

Speaking of refreshments, here is one of another, which is well worth considering at this time, when one must either smother under a net at night or be devoured by the soothing but ravenous mosquito. Take our composition:

TO PREVENT MOSQUITOES FROM BITING.—At this season, when mosquitoes are troublesome, a simple recipe to prevent their "penetrating their bills" may be acceptable. Take a bit of soap, a bit of cotton, a little brick, a little glue, and a little lard, and "mix" with cold water until it is reduced to a "grave jelly;" then apply with a brush to the body. The mosquitoes will fly away, and will not dare to settle on a yankee in your right hand and cut their knobs off at leisure.

Well, really, now, that does not seem so "simple" as we had supposed. We must run our pencil through that sharp enough. Here is another, which don't require a pencilsh:

To prevent mosquitoes from biting at night a physician informs us, take the tincture of pennyroyal, diluted with three-fourths alcohol, and rub on the exposed parts. Also rub on the face and your hair. This is a sure preventive against bites from mosquitoes, and will not injure the skin.

All the good books say that the sick-room is woman's special province, and counsel her to avail herself of all available means of information that she may be qualified for the doctor of nurse. The following, therefore, will be found useful:

APPLYING LEECHES.—Well, my good woman," said the doctor, "how is your husband to-day? Better, no doubt."

"Oh yes! I surely," said the woman. "He is as well as ever, and gone to the field."

"I thought," muttered the doctor. "The leeches have cured him. Wonderful effect they have. You got the leeches, I suppose?"

"Oh yes! they did him a great deal of good, though he will not take them off."

"Take them off! Why, my good woman, how did you get them?"

"Oh! I managed nicely," said the wife, looking quite astonished with the doctor's surprise. "I took one half, and made a fry of the other. The first he got down very well, but the second made him very sick. But when he took was quite enough," continued she, seeing some horror in the doctor's countenance, "and he is quite well next morning, and to-day he is quite well."

Timply! said the doctor, with a significant shake of the head, "if they have cured him that is sufficient, but they could have been applied in a better way."

Is there any rule by which a lady may know when to speak, and when to be silent? Perhaps these items will help her decide:

FOUND AT LAST.—Not far distant from our good village there lives a man who possesses one day got in a spat, and refused to speak for eight or ten days. Well, the husband, poor fellow, although he was naturally inclined to be most severely rebuked for, wished to hear again the chapter of his griefs, and the circumstance made his ears tingle; but she was inexorable. At last he hit upon an expedient which brought her to her senses. He procured a nice and tidy about her furniture and apparel. He stepped into the parlor, seized a broom, and commenced throwing the contents on the floor. She came in when he had nearly completed the destruction of chairs, tables, and bankkerchiefs, and, without thinking, screamed out, "Mercy! what in the world are you doing?"

"Nothing, only looking for my wife's tongue, which I have found at last, and am going to keep it."

A very loquacious lady offered to bet her husband five dollars she would not speak a word for a week. "Done," cried the husband, who was constantly paying out his money, which the lady at once took up and put in her pocket, observing that she would receive it when she bet was decided. "Why," said the husband, "you owe it already." "And what do you owe it for?" "Why," said the lady, "you are mistaken in the time—I have not spoken a word for a month." The husband stopping the same afternoon.

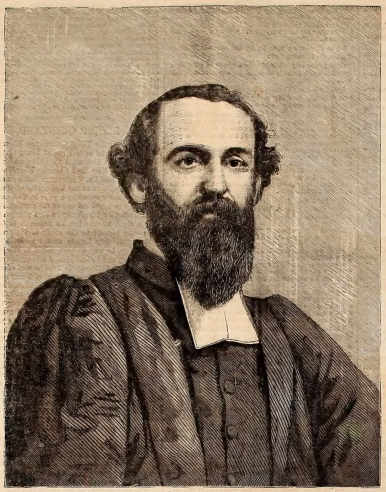
Mr. Benjamin Ward, of Sedgebury Park, was one of the most active members of the Southern Independence Association, and, during the early years of the present century, of the British public the policy and justice of recognizing the independence of the Confederate States at the earliest possible moment. Those Englishmen who would themselves have liked best to be shovelmen were those most ready to sympathize with the shovelmen of the South. The following absurd parade, on the occasion of Miss Hope's marriage, may serve the class of men who the unequivocal party of sympathy:

The marriage of Miss Beresford Hope, eldest daughter of Mr. and Lady Mildred Beresford Hope, of Bedgebury Park, to the Hon. Hollybruton George Campbell, brother of Lord Campbell, took place at Christ Church, on Thursday, amid a vast folk full cheek-worth. The bride was attired in a robe of rich white satin and costly Brussels lace, and veil of the same. At the church door she was met by her twelve bridesmaids, who were all dressed in white grenadine trimmed with blue, and with blue wreaths. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Rev. Henry Harrison. Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" was played by the organist as the party left the church. Outside of the church door a large triangular crowd had been drawn up in order on each side, and scattered flowers in the path for the bride and bridegroom to walk on. There was a long ranging a merry peal as they departed. After the ceremony the company returned to Bedgebury Park, where a sumptuous wedding breakfast had been provided, at which about two hundred were present. At 4 P.M. the bride left the happy pair left for Dover, en route for Switzerland.

BISHOP QUINTARD.

REV. CHARLES TODD QUINTARD, Bishop Elect of Tennessee, the second son of ISAAC QUINTARD, Esq., was born December 22, 1824; was educated in the city of New York; practised as a clerk in the office of the late Dr. VALENTINE MOTT; and graduated in medicine at the University of New York in 1846. After practising for a year in Bellevue Hospital he was appointed one of the physicians to the New York City Dispensary, which position he held but a short time, when he removed to Georgia. Devoting himself to the study of his profession, and contributing largely to the medical literature of the day, he was, in 1851, called to the chair of Physiology and Pathological Anatomy in the Memphis Medical College, which he was afterward to Holy Orders by Bishop Otey, of Tennessee, with whom he had pursued his theological studies. Immediately on being admitted to the priesthood he was called to the rectorship of Calvary Church, Memphis, at the time the largest and most influential parish in the diocese. In 1858 he accepted the rectorship of the Church of the Advent, Nashville, where he has been during the whole of Quintard took charge of it the number of communicants was but thirty-six. In four years it had increased to about three hundred. Dr. Quintard is the author of a "Plain Treatise on Confirmation;" and also of "Prayers for Children," a high office for the use of the Episcopal Church in the South.

The consecration of Dr. QUINTARD took place at the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, held a few days ago in Philadelphia.



BELZORO GOLD MINE, VIRGINIA.

Much public attention has been recently drawn to the vast field of undeveloped mineral wealth existing over a large portion of the surface of Virginia, in gold, silver, tin, copper, and almost every variety of material known to the mineralogist. But in no one instance has the true of what is not only announced by recent explorers as covering under their own observation, but which is gravely asserted by scientific geologists and mineralogists respecting the mineral resources of the Old Dominion, than is the claim of the Belzoro Gold Mine to an amount of enigmatical to speedily become one of the most prosperous States of the Union.

Among various other mines of great importance that have come under his notice, our artist has selected for illustration the property of the Belzoro Gold, in Goochland County, a representation of which will be found elsewhere. In the entire belt of richness known to extend, in an unbroken line, from the border of Maryland to the southwestern extremity of North Carolina, and running parallel with the Alphaian range of five hundred miles in length, there is perhaps no single spot more replete with mineral wealth than Belzoro. Since the mine has been actually found and done upon it, than from all those investable signs respecting which no true mineralogist or geologist can for a moment err.

This place, which doubtless derived its name from Bel Ore (fine gold), bears every proof of high antiquity, and in the chamber of the mine itself, fully understood at some very remote period. Crucibles, in the rude shape of an acorn, and evidently used for the melting of precious metals, have frequently been discovered there, but of what age no one has been able to form the least idea. The mine itself was first discovered there, by surface-washing, in 1832. It then belonged to Mr. WM. SOTHWORTH and gold was obtained in small quantities until 1858, when it was purchased by its present proprietor Mr. GEORGE FRIEND, who has been working it ever since. Discovery follows ever shaft that is sunk, and the discovered rests vein, varying in width from 2 ft. 6 inches to 60 feet, in which the whole mine is now being worked. There is one hill of thirty acres, on which nearly every square foot of rare surface can pay well for washing. As much or more has been obtained from one crushing-machine only, and 61 per day frequently from six ordinary stamps. Nuggets of pure gold weighing from 4 to 7 pennyweights (dollars) have been frequently found in this property, which contains also copper, lead, and iron in abundance, several hundred tons of which these ores having been found there. The lead-vein compound is rich in gold, and is very productive in very heavy timber. It has abundant waterpower, and abounds in creeks and branch flats, different of which well repay surface-washing.

Our view shows one of the many large excavations that have been made on the property, but as usual throughout Virginia—never extending, as in other mining regions, into the main rock, where the true wealth of a mine really begins. It was near this spot that the proprietor, a few months ago, very nearly lost his life by the falling-in of a large portion of rock while he was pursuing his accidental explorations. Although severely hurt, it is a matter of public rejoicing that his estimable and valuable life was spared, for he is confessedly the most practical and experienced geologist and mineralogist in the State of Virginia, having for more than thirty years followed the footsteps of his renowned and deceased father, GEORGE FISHER, in exploring almost every square mile of its surface.

Belzoro Mine is not only rich in itself, but is surrounded by mineral wealth; the adjoining gold mines—known as the "Marks" and the "Collins"—being well known to abound in equally rich treasures, the same vein of which is evidently running through them all. The "Belzoro" and "Marks," which confront each other, and are only divided by the White Hall Road, are situated only seven miles from Columbia, on the James River Canal, the great artery for conveying the treasures of these mines to the commercial world. Few spots in the State of Virginia are more worthy of scientific investigation or the attention of capitalists.

THE RICHMOND, FREDERICKSBURG, AND POTOMAC RAILROAD, VIRGINIA—TRAIN STARTING OUT FROM RICHMOND.—[SKETCHED BY J. R. HAMILTON.]

THE RICHMOND AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

ONE of the busiest and most significant scenes in the daily life of Richmond is the arrival or departure of the trains to and from Washington, at the Dépôt of the Richmond, Fredericksburg, and Potomac Railroad.

As this railroad runs mainly through many of the great battle-fields of Virginia it was necessarily left in a most ruinous condition at the completion of the war; but, owing to the great energy display ed in its repairs, it is now all but completed between Richmond and Washington, and most probably will be before these words are in print. No fewer than eleven bridges have been entirely rebuilt during the past two or three months, and over eleven miles of track relaid, besides the restoring of the wharf at Aquia Creek. The dépôts, which were nearly all destroyed, have also to be rebuilt.

There are at present three trains leaving Richmond daily—two through trains to Washington, and one accommodation train. Both traffic and traveling are increasing daily to an enormous extent; and, with the inducements being daily offered to immigration, we may naturally look forward to a very large business on this road.

One good thing may be said of this railroad in these days of railway murders, and that is, that although it has been in active operation for twenty-seven years, not a single person has ever been killed or maimed upon it. This speaks well for all employed upon it, and for its Superintendent, Captain SAMUEL RUTH, who has been connected with it for nearly twenty-five years. Not only is this gentleman highly prized for his most affable manners by all the traveling public, but he has ever been a strong Unionist, and, indeed, for conscience' sake, had a taste of Libby hospitality.

THE JAMES RIVER AND KANAWHA CANAL.

THE James River and Kanawha Canal is one of the most important features in the commercial life of Richmond. This great work was the enterprise of a Company known as the James River and Kanawha Company; but, with a trifling exception, the means it has employed have been almost altogether from the Treasury of the State. Two hundred miles of it are already completed and in full operation to Buchanan, in Botetourt County, and much more has been done upon it beyond—to Covington, in Alleghany County.

THE JAMES RIVER AND KANAWHA CANAL, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY J. R. HAMILTON.]

The value of this artery of traffic to the commerce of Richmond can not be overstated. It divides with the railroad all the passengers and merchandise passing between Richmond and the West. A trip on this canal, when the weather is not oppressively warm, is exceedingly agreeable to those afflicted or desirous of a change of scene and hot harried for time. It affords one the opportunity of resting, at leisure, many places of historical and local fit by, like some phantasmagoria, in the whirl and speed of railway traveling.

The value of this canal hitherto is nothing to what it is rapidly destined to prove when the enormous mineral wealth of Virginia (just now beginning to excite attention) shall have drawn to it the enterprise and energinion which it is destined to call into play. The gold, copper, coal, and other valuable materials to be found in Goochland, Buckingham, Fluvanna, Amherst, and other counties immediately bordering it, here find their principal outlet to the commercial world; and even the present year may see a larger amount of wealth, dug from the bowels of the earth, passing along the lovely surface of this conduit than the most sanguine have yet dreamed of.

Our artist has represented the scene at the Packet office on the departure of the boat which leaves on alternate days at five o'clock in the morning. It is a busy and characteristic scene, quite peculiar to the city of Richmond.

FIRST PREMIUM

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE. $5

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity.

Originally patented May 31, 1864. Improvements patented June 9, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most wonderful and simple little machine, constructed on the principle of the Elias Howe machine, and makes a stitch even with reverse of motion of feed. Makes the running-stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extreme rapidity, making 16 stitches to each revolution of the Wheel. Will GATHER, HEM, RUFFLE, BRAID, STITCH, and DO EVERYTHING that can be done by any machine of double the price. Range of work, or change of stitch; is NOT LIABLE TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and will last a LIFETIME. It is so different from every other patent. It has taken the PREMIUM at STATE FAIRS, and received the approval of all who have examined it, and of those who have used it.

"For the domestic circle it is invaluable: for the household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Ladies' Book.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—Independent.

"With simple or double thread, making it strong and stitch, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents. Single machines sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular, containing full information, sent free.

CONSTITUTION

LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the most learned and scientific to cases which have no parallel in the present day.

During the past few years we have combined with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any reformers.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that disease can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: Nature is Divine, and has a well-balanced scale, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effects of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the victims from all PARALYSIS, that we deem it unneeded that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA,

INDIGESTION, WEAKNESS OF STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, COSTIVENESS, SICK HEADACHE,

SCROFULA.

ERYSIPELAS, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERUPTIONS, TUMORS, SALT RHEUM, ULCERATIONS, ITCH, ETC., ETC., ETC.

This taint (HEREDITARY AND ACQUIRED), filling life with untold misery, is by the above medicinal remedies, incredible.

RHEUMATISM.

(LUMBAGO), LUMBAGO, SCIATICA, GOUT, NEURALGIA, ETC., ETC.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and all its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated—enormous swellings are reduced. Cases, of acute or chronic, of twenty years' standing, have been cured by it.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the hard breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as a vice.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, such as

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other varieties of the like, which, in much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases.

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, or wherever they may prevail in any part.

Mark Pimples upon the female face, especially upon a diseased action of the Liver, as very great cause to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will correct the secretion, and remove the disease, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Life is giving place to Health.

Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an aggravated or cancerous condition of those organs, accompanied with heartburn or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same disease. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy sons and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, maturity and old age will suffer. It do not delay then the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MANS FRIEND, AND THE RICH MANS BLESSING.

Buy it. Take it, and be Cured.

Brandreth's Pills

A GENERAL ASSISTANT OF NATURE.

What is health? What is disease?

Health is when the supply and expenditure are equal. Disease when the supply and expenditure are unequal.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS impart certain properties to act in all matters in the body where life is below the standard of the surrounding parts, or which have remained longer than the time nature designed. So there, and for all cases of cause which soon run into mortification, BRANDRETH'S PILLS have marvelous curative qualities. Our bodies are machines, and require to be put to their change we live. Should matter remain in organs beyond the time nature designed, pain and inflammation set in, which ends in nothing more than a preparation for our good. All Brandreth's Pills are supposed from the results to do is simply Assisting these Efforts of Nature.

Principal Agency, Brandreth House, New York.

Sold by all dealers in Medicines.

I Can Not Sing the Old Songs.

WORDS AND MUSIC COMPOSED BY CLARIBEL.

I can not sing the old songs
I sung long years ago,
For heart and voice would fail me,
And faithless seem would they;
For by-gone hours come o'er my heart
In the touch that I play.

I can not sing the old songs
For dream those dreams again.

DR. MUDD'S ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE FROM DRY TORTUGAS.

WHEN DR. MUDD, one of the conspirators to assassinate President LINCOLN, was carried to the Dry Tortugas, he gave the Government officers due notice that he should escape if possible. He was allowed great liberties, and on the 25th ult. he made an attempt to escape by concealing himself in a cannon on the steamer Thomas A. Scott, which was lying at the wharf, waiting for the embarkation of the One Hundred and Sixty-first New York Volunteers. Information was immediately given, and after a careful search Lieutenant ARTHUR G. TAPPAN discovered the Doctor in the position indicated by our artist, who was one of the passengers on the steamer Scott.

[SKETCHED BY A FELLOW-PASSENGER ON BOARD THE "SCOTT."]

THE WIRZ TRIAL.

We give on this page an illustration of the WIRZ trial going on at Washington, which portrays a more interesting phase of the trial than a former engraving printed in the last week relating to that subject. As our readers know, Captain WIRZ has during the progress of the trial become quite ill, so that on some days the Commission were under the necessity of adjourning; and when he has been well enough to be present, his indisposition has compelled him to recline on a lounge. "Captain WIRZ," says our artist, "keeps in the position represented in the sketch all day long, excepting when he clutches his bottle of stimulants, or when he is led to his cell by the officer of the guard."

The case for the prosecution has been closed, and the case for the defense is progressing very slowly indeed. The facts which have been sworn to by the witnesses for the prosecution can not be disputed; the only question to be settled is one regarding WIRZ's responsibility for his diabolical acts. In any case, a stain rests upon the military record of the late rebellion which neither tears nor repentance can quite wash out. Andersonville forms an important chapter in the history of the war.

AMERICAN UNION COMMISSION.

We publish an engraving on page 661, illustrating the celebration of the last Fourth of July at Richmond by the American Union Commission. The tent of the Commission was spread upon the park surrounding the State buildings. It was a great day for the colored population of the city of Richmond, who had never had an Independence Day before.

The American Union Commission is the continuation, in some sort, of the Christian Commission, and is an organization entirely independent of the Freedmen's Bureau or the Freedmen's Society. Its purpose is to aid and co-operate with the people in those portions of the South which have been desolated and impoverished by the war, in the restoration of their civil and social condition upon the basis of industry, education, freedom, and Christian morality. In the prosecution of this purpose it contemplates the relief of poverty and distress, the encouragement of a healthful emigration, and of a patriotic devotion to the Union.

The Commission recognizes no distinctions of caste or color. It includes leading men of all denominations in its organization. It embraces Commissions organized in the cities of New York, Boston, Baltimore, Chicago, Cincinnati, Nashville, Richmond, and other points united in one national board. It has the sanction of the National Government, and receives transportation and other facilities from the War Department.

The labors of the Commission at Richmond alone may be stated as follows: ninety thousand rations of flour have been distributed, seventy-five thousand rations of soup, eight thousand papers of garden seeds, and one hundred and fifty farming implements. Besides these, many delicacies have been given to the sick, for whom tea has been procured also careful medical attendance. Two hundred and fifty children have been supplied with school instruction, and thousands of books and papers have been gratuitously distributed. At other points in the South the Commission can show a record which will commend it to every philanthropist.

TRIAL OF CAPTAIN WIRZ, THE ANDERSONVILLE JAILER, IN THE COURT OF CLAIMS, WASHINGTON, D. C.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. HAVINDEN.]

POOR HUMANITY.

Is purple robe and jeweled crown
The great king sits in regal state,
And if he smile or if he frown
A hundred noble lords who wait
How at his throne; yet what is he,
In spite of royal robe or crown,
In spite of kingly smile or frown,
But part of poor humanity!

Outside the palace gate there stands
A beggar, with a face of woe,
Who, clad in rags, with outstretched hands,
Asks alms of those that come and go—
A brother of the king is he,
A common Father both may claim,
That God our weak lips may not name,
Who pities poor humanity.

See in the careless crowds that pass
Along the city's busy street,
The rich and poor; there, too, also!
Both shame and modest virtue meet;
Brothers and sisters all are we,
Whatever is our worldly lot,
It matters not by whom begot—
A part of poor humanity!

The rich man sipping costly wine
Whate'er the foolish worldling thinks,
Is linked with him who from the vine
Crushes the juice the other drinks;
Though nursed in easy luxury, he
May scorn the laborer in his heart,
Forgetful that each drop a part
Of that poor thing humanity!

Up yonder crazy stairs dwells one
Who toils through all the livelong day,
Toils till her weary work is done
To give the husband wolf away—
A sister, wan and pale, is she,
To her, that other, young and fair,
Who risked ruin with stylish pair,
A part of poor humanity!

Great Heaven, look kindly from above
On us the children of Thy care,
And fill our selfish hearts with love,
Be ever this earnest prayer—
Oh give us grace that we may see
The faults that every virtue mar,
And strength to hide in life that are
The lot of poor humanity!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1865.

STATE OF FEELING AT THE SOUTH.

THAT the people of the United States may decide wisely whether the exclusive control of the late rebel States may be immediately and safely surrendered to the late rebel population of those States, it is essential to know the prevailing sentiment of that population. This can not be too constantly and widely spread before the country. And let us look at it a little.

In Mississippi an unpardoned rebel, General HUMPHREYS, has just been elected Governor by the "Union" voters, and Governor SHARKEY loses his popularity and his chance of election to the Senate, because he favors giving the colored people the right to testify, and the late candidates for the Legislature have been defeated upon the same ground. Of the general feeling in the State of Mississippi General SHERMAN'S order of August 24 very fully informs us. On that date he thought it extremely dangerous to the public peace to allow the arming of the late rebel citizens as militia. They are, however, arming, and they refuse to organize under the United States flag. Meanwhile the state of things described by General SLOCUM continues. The colored people are daily murdered and Union men maltreated, and nobody is punished or arrested.

In Louisiana the Democratic Convention resolves that the Government was made exclusively for white men, that rebels ought to be paid for their emancipated slaves, and that there should be a general amnesty and repeal of confiscation laws. It is not surprising, therefore, as we are told by a gentleman from Louisiana, who is neither "a radical" nor "a Jacobin," that the continuance of the national hold upon that State is absolutely essential to the public peace and personal safety of Union men. His statement is confirmed by the letter of a prominent citizen of New Orleans to a Western paper, that "no Union man, that is to say, no man approving the war for the salvation of the country is safe in this State."

From the same private information is of the same kind. "Withdraw your troops," said in our office within a few days the editor of a Union paper in that State, a man faithful through the war, "and we white Union men will swing within the next hour." Another Georgian informs us that he has been twice shot at for his known Unionism.

In Alabama the reorganizing Convention refuses to submit the new Constitution for the approval of the people; and from a total population of 964,000 excludes 437,000 from any computation in the basis of representation.

In South Carolina the ordinance of secession is simply repealed, leaving it lawful to renew it when the State chooses, and out of a total population of 730,000 there are 412,000 excluded from computation in the basis of representation.

From Alabama a correspondent in Mobile, a native and life-long resident of the city, writes us:

"I know well who the few loyal men were here during the war, and how bitterly and relentlessly they were persecuted by the citizens and military authorities. Provost Marshals, Major W. H. KEYCUTS and H. G. HOWARDS. The secessionists now say, 'Let us bury the past!' They send as delegates to Washington, and are received with favor; the leading men are coming back daily into position—get with the military—visit the military—request the President to order it from the country, and the people govern themselves, and are preparing to commence their reign of terror once more. The reports about Wirz had not all burning. I have sat ahead of two really loyal meetings in the State—one at Decatur, Alabama, on the 3d June; and one at this city on 4th June,——. The various offices here, even under the General Government, are full of bitter rebels, and they openly boast of their Confederate republican. If you attempt to stop any of the national airs you are shunned. Very few of the steamboats will carry the flag; the latter will not walk under the head-quarters flag, but leave the sidewalk and walk in the street. In the street cars loyal men are openly demeaned, which makes it very unpleasant for their families. In fact, the criterion the Mobilians use to judge any one is—What did he do in the Confederate cause? and those who did most are the most thought of. The sovereign people say that they have been 'sold and sacrificed' into the war should not be trusted in office now. This accounts for the many of the Yankees who have settled to the State Convention. Mr. L. made a celebrated 'Black Flag' speech in this city a few days before Spanish Fort was taken. The papers refuse to publish any favorable article showing up the disgraceful conduct of the rebel leaders here during the past three years. When the Daily News started here it contained loyal articles, but the editor soon saw that such a course would ruin it for a Mobile paper, and has lately been publishing such articles that Major-General CANBY has ordered suppressed, or suppress his paper. Unfortunately General GARRARD was ordered away from this post, and the authorities now seem to encourage rebel and rebels with confidence. We have no idea of the tyranny that has existed here. Every man from seventeen to fifty was impressed and forcibly enrolled in the army, and on the slightest emergency every body who could escape was forced into the trenches or to do guard duty in the city."

It is into such hands that General SLOCUM and the Democratic party are anxious that the Government of the United States should, within thirty days, resign the authority it now holds in the late rebel States. It seems to us that General SLOCUM and his party entertain very little respect for the common-sense of the American people.

GENERAL SLOCUM AT VISSBURG AND SYRACUSE.

On the 24th of August of this year General SLOCUM issued an elaborate order in the State of Mississippi, of which he was military commander. Governor SHARKEY had invited the President of the State to form militia companies, and the order of General SLOCUM countermanded it. In his speech the General says that he merely acted in accordance with the Act Department. But he forgets that the very terms of his elaborate order show that it was not a "mere" obedience to superior command; it was an elaborate argument and conclusive statement of reasons why such a course was unwise and perilous.

General SLOCUM'S order was the one whom Governor SHARKEY invited to arm are "that class of men who have as yet scarcely laid down the arms with which they have been opposing our Government." He adds:

"To permit the young men who so distinguished themselves to be armed and organized independently of United States authority, would be to invite a class of men them to operate in counties now garrisoned by colored troops, and, as many of them are known to be, with a prejudice against those troops, and against the execution of order related to their interests, to have a powerful advantage in the event of any collision at once, and increase in a tenfold degree the difficulties that now beset the people."

That there may be no misapprehension as to the exact condition of affairs in the State, of which by military command he was thoroughly informed, General SLOCUM continues:

"It is a remarkable fact that most of the outrages have been committed against Northern men, unconnected with planters, and colored people. Southern citizens have been hunted by these outlaws, but at once released and informed that they have been stopped by mistake. And these outrages have refused to give information as to the parties by whom they were committed, although frankly acknowledging that they knew them."

The General then says that Governor SHARKEY agrees that the Government is receiving information to the United States military authorities which will lead to the detection of these outlaws." Yet the Governor asks to arm those very people. General SLOCUM thereupon says:

"A better plan will be to disarm all such citizens, and make it for their interest to aid those who have been sent here to restore order and preserve peace."

Here is a vivid and warning picture of the condition of affairs in the State of Mississippi, both as regards the spirit of the population and their treatment of the colored men who were the only considerable body of Unionists in the State. No correspondent has made or could make so strong an argument for the necessity of the maintenance of the United States armed authority in that State. Has this "state of condition changed suddenly within six weeks? Because the State Convention has not done any body imagine that the population are better affected toward the National Government? Yet on the 24th of October General SLOCUM, having in the mean time resigned his commission as an officer of the United States and become HORATIO SEYMOUR'S candidate for Secretary of State in New York, says in Syracuse:

"I most heartily approve the removal of the troops from that State [of Mississippi], and I most earnestly hope that within thirty days every soldier now on duty there will be withdrawn, and that all the people to the end to interfere with her local affairs will cease. Now that the State has adopted a constitution which does not recognize slavery, I would confide to the sentiment of all questions likely to arise as to the means of supporting and controlling the freedmen."

Why is General SLOCUM ready on the 24 of October to do what on the 24th of August he solemnly said "would bring about a collision at once, and increase in a tenfold degree the difficulties that now beset the people?" Why is he willing to wink at outrages "against Northern men, Government couriers, and colored people?"

The reason is plain and painful. It is because General SLOCUM is now the candidate of JOHN A. GREEN, of the New York Daily News, of every haughty unrepentant rebel in the unorganized States, and of every one of those people who denounce Union men as "outlaws" and "villains" on the 24th of August.

These are the men who built and supported the Chicago platform last year. They cried out for surrender to this rebellious spirit then. They demand the same surrender now. Do the people of the North trust this spirit? Has there ever been any more this year than the last? Does it occur to General SLOCUM that he invites a doubt whether his patriotism is not measured by his ambition, when he thus deserts the Union men who shared his fidelity during the war and joins a party which seeks to put the rebel States entirely into the hands of those whom he would not permit to be armed because he did not believe them to be truly loyal?

STALE SMALL BEER.

IN the report of a speech made a few days since in Albany by Mr. JOHN VAN BUREN we find this sentence: "By the unjust war waged against the Southern governments the basis has been overthrown and slavery abolished."

Mr. VAN BUREN steals his thunder. The Democratic Peace Convention at Syracuse in August, 1864, in the same spirit called it "a bloody and relentless war for the avowed purpose of exterminating eight millions of freemen from the homes of their fathers."

The Ashland Union, a Democratic paper in Ohio, expressed Mr. VAN BUREN'S sentiment more vigorously: "The black Republicans began this war. You have carried it on for two years. You have sent your kith and kin from South to devastate the country, and what have you done? You have not conquered the South; you never can conquer it."

So Mr. VAN BUREN'S worthy co-laborer in the defamation of the loyal masses of the country, Mr. HENRY WINTER DAVIS, said at Chicago in ratifying Mr. VAN BUREN'S platform and candidate for the Presidency: "Ever since the usurper, traitor, and tyrant had occupied the Presidential chair the Republican party has shouted war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt."

The Albany Argus denounced the first call for the President of 75,000 men as a "usurpation."

Mr. JOHN VAN BUREN'S friend, HORATIO SEYMOUR, for whose election, in 1862, Mr. VAN BUREN worked so zealously, said in February of the previous year: "No one is mad enough to propose a division of the Southern territory." He added that the war would "prove ruinous to the North and develop the resources of the South."

Mr. VAN BUREN rehashes these stale Copperhead sneers and furies for service in the present campaign of the Democratic party. They are merely foolish now. But when they were fresh and threatening, and Mr. JOHN VAN BUREN was trying to persuade the country to submit to determined rebels, the wayward sisters go, ANDREW JOHNSON said in the Senate of the United States, not that the war was "unjust," but that politicians of "the Seward stripe" were responsible for it, but, "When we look all around, we see how the Governors of the different States have been involved in this conspiracy—the most stupendous and gigantic conspiracy that was ever formed, and as corrupt and as foul as that attempted by CATILINE in the days of Rome. We know it to be so....." The time has arrived when we should show to the nations of the earth that we are a nation capable of preserving our existence, and give them evidence that we will do it.....If for the prosecution of this war in behalf of the Government and the Constitution it is necessary to cleanse and purify the banner, I say let it be baptized in fire from the sun and bathed in a nation's blood."

The ring of gold is very different from that of copper.

RIGHTS OF STATES AND OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE "sacred rights of States" are constantly pleaded by those who have steadily excused the rebellion and denounced the Government, as if any State where rebellion has been suppressed by force of arms had any rights whatever but such as the National Government chooses to recognize. It is upon this principle that the President proceeds in appointing provisional Governors and directing a form of State government to be submitted to Congress for its approval.

This principle is recognized by many of the most recalcitrant of the late rebels. Thus the Richmond Times, speaking of the resolutions of '98 and of MADISON and JEFFERSON, says:

"In the present condition of their native State they would have repudiated the doctrine of nullification as law." They would agree with us that in times like these there is no royal, time-honored road to reconstruction, except unadmonized, fenced in and mapped off in accordance with a set of principles and resolutions intended for the government of the machine of civil government, when moving on the regular and constitutional track."

And now the New York Herald, which has no opinions or convictions, but which merely echoes the current sentiment of the street, can not escape the inevitable truth, and is obliged to say:

"The members of all these reconstructing Conventions and Legislatures should remember that their work is experimental, and subject to the revision of superior authorities and wisher upon the business before them are the only existing guides for their guidance; that the war has invested him with the authority which he exercises."

That is the principle upon which Congress will settle the question of reorganization. It will not be the equal rights of rebels and rebellious States, but of loyal men and the Union, which will determine the matter. In the present circumstances the country has not a right in a late rebel State which can control the action of the nation.

PUNCHING COPPER HEADS.

SENATOR WILSON is probably as good an authority for what are called the "rebel" administration men as Mr. JOHN VAN BUREN or the Copperhead newspapers. The latter are chucking over their prophecy of a division in the Union ranks. They are full of hope that some Union men are going to desert to the ranks of HORATIO SEYMOUR and JOHN A. GREEN, and that President JOHNSON will be backed of those who prayed God to have mercy upon the nation when ANDREW JOHNSON came into power. Senator WILSON is of a different opinion. "There will be no trouble," he says, "between us and the President."

The Democratic brethren are very loud in their professions of support of the President's policy. But, says Senator WILSON, the Emancipation Amendment is the great corner-stone of this policy. He insists also upon negro suffrage. The twenty-two States that voted for Mr. JOHNSON support it. The three that voted, under the Democratic lead, for GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN do not support it. If New Jersey is carried by the Union men, she will be for it. If she is swamped by the Democracy, she will repudiate it. Is this supporting the President's policy? The Senator dares them to come out frankly and squarely for this first specific measure of the Presidential policy.

The Senator also reminds us that this Democratic dodge of wearing a mask of friendship for the President, whom the party have been steadily ridiculed and denounced, does not deceive the people. In Maine the Democratic party resolved to support the President, and received by the 7000 majority more than last year when they abused him. "Here in New York," he says, "these men who were on the Chicago platform last year declare that we are indorsing the President. Well, they are coming along, and still follow us as they have done for the last four years." He emphasizes the luckless wayward sister VAN BUREN as follows:

"JOHN VAN BUREN, my old Free Soil friend, nominated at Utica, is a brave, honorable, and faithful man, and my firm belief, because a few years since he first trusted out MARTIN VAN BUREN, I know that MR. VAN BUREN is actuated by ability or character to talk as he did, for I remember that he was a conspicuous leader in the Free Soil movement, in which I was the mover, and I remember that each move in Cuzzes and ADAMS and SUMNER thought that something was to be made of Democrats, but they were all after strange gods, and what is his record to-day? Those whom he left have not only coped with and defeated the leaders of the black cohorts of slavery, and have associated their names with great deeds and great events, while he has made no record; and if he dies to-day he makes no sigh. I commend him as a profound source of such utterances."

The Union party has all the prestige of principle, purpose, and success. The questions upon which they united are not settled, and they will settle them, as they have already settled the Democratic party which has existed for no other purpose for twenty years than to protect slavery, and which now sees slavery swept away under the administration of a man whom the Democrats slandered with witless fury, and who marches on with the great party which supported him and ABRAHAM LINCOLN and the war to put all wounds and plant the American Union upon the eternal rock of Liberty and Law.

THE GOLD ROOM.

It looks as though the new Gold Room would after all have something to do. For some weeks after the gold brokers moved into their new quarters the price was so steady, that speculators became disgusted with buying for the rise and selling for the fall, and brokers' commissions fell off at a rate that was alarming. Within the past week, however, thanks to the agreeable fictions of the hangers on of the Treasury Department about the receipts from internal revenue—which deceive no one, and alarm a great many; to the development of the fact that the Government owes $15,000,000 payable on demand, which of course is not at rest, the theory of immediately funding any substantial portion of the currency; and to the condition of our foreign trade, which requires large specie exports inevitable at no distant day—new speculation in gold has been started, and now bids fair to become pretty lively, with the usual fluctuations, up and down. It is not on the cards, however, that the new room will ever emulate the glories of its predecessors.

When large specie sales were first suspended, dealings in gold were confined to the regular Stock Exchange. Considerable amounts were bought and sold at the morning and afternoon calls, and there was no other mart where large operations in specie could be made. Unfortunately for the Stock Exchange, it was persuaded one day to pass resolutions prohibiting gold operations in gold. The design was loyal; the act silly in the extreme. Stock brokers could no more prevent fluctuations in gold, and speculations based on those fluctuations, than they could prevent the ebb and flow of the tide by passing resolutions that they would disregard them.

A certain class of persons, speculators in gold and exchange brokers, began to meet in Gilpin's Rooms, on the corner of William Street and Exchange Place, and to deal in gold there, as they had for a year or more been used to deal in exchange. A small room was rented, and a few dozen papers were on file, and a dirty, dingy room adjacent, with a low ceiling, offered a location for the gold gamblers, who paid PIN charged $25 a year for admission to his ROOMS, and for that sum say rogue could enter. In two or three months his rooms became the centre and focus of the gold trade. First scores, then hundreds, then thousands of men subscribed their $25 apiece, and enjoyed the privileges of the rooms. All the gold brokers of the United States was done there during the terrible times of the war, when gold rose from par to 185. It was a vile place, and the brokers who dealt there earned their money. Not only was the air morbific, and the throng so dense that most of the constitutions were speedily fainted and were carried out; but every applicant being admitted, it was utterly unsafe to bid or to offer gold, as you might be taken up by a man who was notoriously insolvent, and yet whose acceptance of your bid or offer might possibly be binding on you in law. Notwithstanding these and a hundred other evils, many millions a day was done in Gilpin's Rooms throughout 1863 and 1864. Immense fortunes were made there. Poor men became rich, and rich men became poor. Most of the frequenters of the room were Bulls, and made money during the long agony of the Rebellion; and while Congress, under the advice of MR. STEVENS, was stultifying itself by trying to restrict the traffic in gold.

But the difficulty with Gilpin's Rooms was, that there was no means of enforcing contracts or preventing defaulters from dealing there. To remedy this, an organization was formed, called the Gold Room, under laws similar to those of the Stock Exchange and Open Board of Stock-brokers, and took a room up stairs at the corner of William and Beaver streets. Gold dealers and their brokers went into this room some time last year. It was at one time a notable institution. Its frequenters constituted three classes: members, who were admitted on payment of $1000 entrance fee, if they underwent the ordeal of a vote by secret ballot; associates, who paid $500 entrance fee, and could not themselves buy or sell, though they enjoyed all the other privileges of members and visitors, who paid $100 a year for the satisfaction of watching from a narrow gallery the fluctuations in the precious metal. It was in this room that gold fell from 250 to 137. During the decline the throng inside the room and around it, in Beaver Street, was at times so dense that a strong squad of police was often in requisition to keep the street open and prevent the Gold Room door from being hermetically sealed. Men used to take their stand on the sidewalk opposite this room as early as nine o'clock, though the doors did not open till ten. These outsiders were generally German Jews. A few Englishmen and Frenchmen were among them, and a very few Americans; but nine-tenths of the crowd spoke German, and were unmistakable children of Israel. The Americans were generally Southerners and Bulls. A Charleston clergyman — a perfect gentleman in manner—was a leading character among them. LEE's surrender quelched them out; they haven't been heard of since.

Last spring the gold brokers felt the necessity of moving to Broad Street, and being rich —as an organization—they had a room built for them between Broad and Beaver streets, with an entrance at 14 Broad. It is a fine room, with a lofty ceiling, and more space than the old dealers will ever require. Those who are familiar with the din and turmoil of the old room on the corner of Beaver and William streets are struck with the quiet of the new Gold Room. The ceiling is so lofty and the room so spacious that there is no reverberation of sound; the volume of business, besides, has been greatly reduced of late. Still, within the last week fully ten millions of gold have been sold and bought every morning in that great room, and often as much more as that during the amounts have changed hands. There will come a day when gold will fall to the neighborhood of par; when that happens the new Gold Room will possibly be almost as noisy and as active as the old one.

For some weeks the Government has been the great client of the gold brokers. Within a few days together $500,000 gold have been disposed of by the Government brokers every morning. Whether the Government may wisely in selling gold secretly through brokers, who do not give up their principal, is a question which has given rise to considerable discussion; and, on the whole, the prevailing impression among sound men, who are likewise loyal, is, that an auction sale of the Government gold, conducted in the usual manner, and with a specification of the amount to be sold, would be more satisfactory to the public and more profitable to the Government. Just now the question is of little moment. People stand ready to buy all the gold Government will sell, and the buyer they can buy it the better will they be pleased.

In England the Government broker is well known. When a panic occurs he appears in the market and buys gold for the Bullion Fund, or some other Department of Government which requires Government funds. But there is no panic now, and no loss. There is no one can tell whether MR. MCCULLOCH is or is not selling gold—or, if he be a seller, how much he has to sell. But the Government gold has been any ground for the accusations which have been preferred in certain quarters respecting the alleged intimacy of Secretaries CHASE, FESSENDEN, and MCCULLOCH with speculators in Wall Street. But if the sales of Government gold were calculated—as is not the case at present—after the price of the day, it would become very desirable indeed that, in the present inform condition of human nature, the knowledge of those sales should not be confined to a few persons, who by reason thereof would enjoy an opportunity of making money.

IS THE ASS A LION?

THE NEW YORK World informs the American people that a Democratic party carried on the war and saved the Union. "The Democrats of America," says this pleasing journal, fresh from describing President JOHNSON as a "dear, an illustrious, and a dreaded foe," consistently, patiently, and at last, through the mercy of Heaven, victoriously preserved in the time of dear, narrow path of loyalty to the Union."

Truth is always simple. On the 17th of December, 1863, the Hon. GEORGE CLAY SMITH, of Kentucky, introduced the following resolution into the House of Representatives: "That we hold it to be the duty of Congress to pass all necessary bills to supply men and money, and the duty of the people to render every aid in their power to the constituted authorities of the Government in the vigorous prosecution of the rebellion and in bringing the leaders thereof to condign punishment." On this plain test question in a full house the vote on the Democratic side was three yeas to sixty-five nays. In the next August the National Convention of the same party held the war a failure, and demanded an immediate cessation of hostilities.

Such was the way in which the Democratic party "persistently and patiently and victoriously persevered" in the war. "

COMPLIMENTING "OVER THE LEFT."

THE party of the "proud record" went last year to Chicago and resolved that the war was a failure, and that the public welfare demanded an immediate cessation of hostilities. Upon this ignoble platform they placed General MCCLELLAN. At the election the loyal American people overwhelmingly rebuked the false and unmanly declaration, the party that made it, and the candidate that represented it. This year MR. JOHN VAN BUREN, who longed to let "the wayward sisters go," asks the same party "Who shall be our next candidate for the Presidency?" He answers his own question by saying: "The Democrats, if they had their own way, would, on an ordinary occasion, be disposed to support General MCCLELLAN." But as that presumption of "wisdom and ability" is no longer available, the ingenious orator suggests that the Chicago gentry must make the best of a bad case, and—since they can't have their own way—nominate ANDREW JOHNSON! Why not GEORGE H. PENDLETON? What has he done?

We doubt if the President is flattered by this left-handed compliment. He knows that however assertive in their present purpose the Chicago party find it to ingratiate themselves with ANDREW JOHNSON, the man of all men they would select, "if they had their own way," would be that model patriot, ROBERT E. LEE.

TWO QUESTIONS.

THE New York World says that "the question for voters is, whether those who approve of the policy of the President are likely to aid it by upholding the Republican party." The question for the President is, whether the lasting peace of the country is likely to be restored by the Republican party, or by defeat his election by supporting GEORGE H. PENDLETON, who declared that if VALLANDIGHAM's plan for cutting up the Union into four parts failed, "separation must be the result," and if you can not conciliate, "let the seceding States depart in peace."

PROPERTY IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

PROPERTY in this city is already too extravagant a luxury for any body but a millionaire. The very worst investment that a man can make of his money is bonds and mortgages. The rate of the City Hall, of which we lately spoke, have sharpened their teeth anew, and woe to the man who, after toiling hard all his life, and piling up a little fortune, dies leaving it to his wife and children, thinking they are well provided for. It is the rate of the City Hall who are provided for. It is the rate of the City Hall for whom he has been spending his strength and life. It is the rate of the City Hall who, when he dies, will be the only person who has amassed, and eat his wife and children out of doors.

There are many persons who think there is too loud a cry about civic reform, and suppose that every body who denounces the mad extravagance of the City Government has a grind. But let such persons look at a few facts, and if they are intending to invest in this city they may pause a little to reflect whether they had not better wait until the rats have been expelled.

We know, for instance, this case: An industrious man worked hard all his life, and died, leaving his widow and five tender children $100,000, invested in bonds and mortgages in the city of New York, bearing, on an average, per cent. interest, that is—$6000 per annum. Here was a snug and pleasant provision for the bereaved family. Poor widow! Poor children! The rats were already after their bread and butter.

The city and county rates on this amount of property are now, at the rate of $2.45 per cent., which is the rate for the year 1865, are $2900, leaving $3010 as the income. The widow has to pay this out upon this sum, at 5 per cent., is $150 50, leaving $2859 50 as the net income for the widow and five young children of a man who died leaving them $100,000.

Your city and county investments, subject to the teeth of the rats, will thus give your family less than three per cent. interest. Is it extraordinary that persons who work hard to leave their children comfortable wish to see some little change in this system? If such men are to be taxed at the rate of three per cent. upon their capital, may they not at least expect dead cats and horses to be removed from the streets of a city bearing the title of cholera is hastening? And when these very rats of the City Hall, who relentlessly consume the substance of honest widows and children, go to Albany Commissioners and Legislature and declaim against the iniquity and tyranny of the national taxes to pay soldiers and sailors and patriotic men, who during a terrible war freely lent to the Government as much of their property as the rats left them, is there an honest man in the city who does not think it is the most shameful company of burglars who are crying stop thief!

If a man wishes to invest his money, let him trust the interior of the United States and beware the City Hall rats of the city and county of New York.

A WORD TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

It is a painful truth that the tidiest housekeeper will often find the fair white walls or the pretty paper of her chambers soiled and spoiled, and her house endangered by the vile habit of scratching matches to light the gas, and throwing the half-burned match away. The reason is that the usual gaslighter is too cumbrous, and no other is neat and "handy" substitute had been hitherto found. But the "Halidon Gaslighter" supplies this universal want. It is a convenient rod of wax about two or three feet long, of the thickness of a large wire, which can be carried from room to room without dripping, without soiling the fingers, and without smell, and one lighter is quite sufficient for all the fixtures in the house. They can be had at MITCHELL, VANCE, & CO., 620 Broadway; ARCHER & PANCOAST, 9 Mercer Street; FIELDING & HOPKINS, 74 Beekman Street, New York; of CONNELLEY & BAKER, 821 Liberty Street, Philadelphia; and probably at all the principal Gas Fixture shops in the other cities.

We cordially commend them to all thrifty housekeepers as a most valuable invention.

LITERARY.

"Prison Life at the South during the Years 1864-'5," by A. O. A. ABBOTT, Lieutenant 1st New York Dragoons. (HARPER & BROTHERS.) In this timely, complete, and painfully interesting record of personal experience in the rebel prisons at Libby, Richmond, Macon, Savannah, Columbia, Charlotte, Raleigh, Goldsborough, and Andersonville, the cruelty of the rebellion in the treatment of Union prisoners is portrayed with all the simplicity of truth. It is a revelation both of the spirit of the inhuman rule and of the unswerving fidelity of the white and colored loyal men of the South to the Union and its soldiers, which every man should seriously ponder now when it is gravely proposed to intrust the welfare and the safety of our cause in these States exclusively to the mercies of the bitterest enemies of the Government and its fundamental principle of equal rights.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

RECONSTRUCTION.

THE Democratic Louisiana Convention of Louisiana which met on the 8d, nominated JOHN MCCLUSKY, JR., for Governor, and elected a Governor; indorsed President JOHNSON'S reconstruction policy; declared the secession ordinance to be null and void; appealed to the national Government for universal amnesty; declared returning to rebel allegiance not an additional privilege of citizenship, and compensation for slaves freed by the Government preposterous.

The election for Governor in Mississippi has resulted in the choice of B. G. HUMPHREYS, largely by rebel general.

On the 6th of October the North Carolina Reconstruction Convention assembled.

"That the ordinance of the Convention of the State of North Carolina, passed the 24th day of November, 1861, which adopted and ratified the Constitution of the United States, and all the amendments thereto, and all acts of the General Assembly ratifying and adopting amendments to the said Constitution of the United States, and to all laws for the adoption and ratification thereof have been, in full force and effect, from the commencement of the existence of the same, to the 20th of May, 1861, declaring the same to be repealed, rescinded, and annulled, and that the said supposed ordinance be now, and at all times hath been, null and void."

The Convention adjourned sine die. Savery was passed on the 7th. The election for Governor will be held November 9.

The Reconstruction Committee of Texas have appointed mail routes in Southern Arkansas and Louisiana.

The Governor of South Carolina has issued a proclamation ordering for the election for delegates to the Georgia Convention to take place on the 4th.

The election for members of Congress in Arkansas took place on the 9th.

NEWS ITEMS.

On the 3d General Robert E. Lee was installed President of Washington College, Virginia.

The Judge-Advocate, Colonel Chipman, has refused to release from arrest any of the rebel Generals Lee and Johnston in the Wirz trial, on the ground that there were conflicting orders in this case.

Colonel Jacques, one of the famous volunteer press correspondents of the Toledo, has been arrested in Louisville, Kentucky (whither he had been sent by order to attend to the banishing by civil process), for procuring an abortion upon a woman who attempted to sue him for seduction, resulting in the wife's party were arrested in Barnwell district, and are now in jail, for having in their possession the letters of the Rebel Vice-President that led to the interference of the police."

The Secretary of the Interior has forbidden the officers of the Department to collect subscriptions in their public capacity for the election.

On the 5th a severe earthquake took place in SAN FRANCISCO, which shook the whole city, demolished some buildings, and left their walls in a tottering state. Several persons were injured, both in the city and in the country. The shocks continued for about a minute, and were followed by a heavy rain storm, which caused upon the terror existing. The oscillation of the earth was from north to south. The shocks were felt as far as Santa Barbara in the ground in some places two or three inches wide. The most severe shocks were at various other towns in the interior of the State.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Fenians continue to be arrested, and important documentary evidence is accumulating against them. Mr. Barry, one of the Queen's Counsel, stated on the 30th ult. that within the last few days information had been received and had arrived from America, to be expended in revolutionizing Ireland, and by that day's post the Government had interrupted a letter for one of the prisoners, named Leggey, containing a draft for four hundred and fifty pounds on the house of Rothschilds. Several other letters containing bills of exchange had been intercepted. The making of plans had also been extensively carried on. Drawings of the Fenian flag, and other matters of treasonable weapons. Numerous revolvers and breast-plates had also been found in possession of persons connected with the Irish People newspaper. He quoted an intercepted letter from Stephens to Kickham, dated Sunday, 1865.

A private letter received from Constantinople states that the cholera which had been raging there up to the 5th of September destroyed about ten thousand tenements, by which upwards of forty thousand people are left without a roof to cover them.

THE EMBASSY FROM TUNIS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE EMBASSY FROM TUNIS.

NEW YORK CITY is the world in miniature. In a recent number of Fraser's Magazine M. D. CONWAY thus writes of the metropolis:

"The city of New York is to-day the same great eddy of the mixed human elements of the whole world that it was when the DUKE OF YORK gave it its name. A vast impersonal floating city, rising and falling with the general tide of human life throughout the world, America is no more responsible for its good or its evil than any other country. It is a short and easy method of traveling around the world to take one's stand on Broadway: the world will pass by you if you stay long enough. In one day I have seen there Indians in their skins, paint, and feathers; Chinamen with their pigtails; Japanese, whose popularity there suggests how, with the help of a skillful cutswier and some Oriental names, we might lift the whole negro population into princely regard. ('You know very well, said a preacher, rebuking the prejudice against color, 'that an ape with one million a year would be welcome in your best society.') They all come here sooner or later,' said a New Yorker, with a patronizing glance at the FRENCH OF VALOIS, whom he was receiving his ovation there—'they all come here sooner or later, though sometimes we don't know it; for instance, there were LOUIS NAPOLEON and PRINCE JEROME, and there was GARIBALDI, and one day they found a natural son of FREDERICK WILLIAM of PRUSSIA working here as a carpenter. Yes, Sir, I am looking for his Holiness the POPE every day!'"

At length, after waiting so long, we have seen Tunis. There arrived by the Persia at this port, on the 6th instant, a party of four gentlemen, of whom three were natives of Tunis, while the fourth was Mr. PERRY, the American Consul at the Court of Tunis.

The gentlemen comprising the party—which proves to be an embassy from the Bey of Tunis to President JOHNSON—are General OTHAN HASHIM, special envoy; Colonel RAMERO GATTA, his aide-camp; the Chevalier ANTONIO CORTE, secretary and interpreter, together with Mr. PERRY, before referred to. We give portraits on page 660 of this party, and also one of the Bey of Tunis himself on this page.

The gentlemen composing this important embassy are not Africans, in the general acceptance of that term, though Tunis is situated on the African coast of the Mediterranean; they rather resemble the Moors or Turks. They are a fine-looking group of men, with well-developed physique, and divested of their costumes and set down in New Orleans they would be taken as remarkably fair representatives of the Creole race; and as they are men of refined manners and speak the French language fluently this illusion would only be heightened by conversation with them.

MR. PERRY, our Consul, who is acting as chaperon to the other members of the embassy, returns to his native country after a three years' absence. He was from the State of Rhode Island, where he has many friends and influential acquaintances.

THE BEY OF TUNIS.

GENERAL HASHIM is a man of about fifty years of age, and has a soldierly appearance. Colonel GATTA is a fine-looking man of about thirty. Chevalier CORTE is the youngest of the party.

The Bey of Tunis is nominally under the jurisdiction of the Turkish Sultan, though he is virtually independent of the latter. Tunis itself contains about 72,000 square miles, and a population of little over two millions of souls. The soil is sandy, but for the most part remarkably fertile. The principal vegetable productions—wheat, maize, barley, olives, dates, and grapes—come to perfection with little care on the part of the cultivators. The principal cities besides the capital, Tunis, are Susa, Hammamet, Bizanta, Cabes and Bega. The State religion is Mohammedanism. The title of the Bey is hereditary. His revenue is derived from taxes and imports, and is estimated at more than four millions a year. His armed force amounts to fifty thousand men, while the navy is made up of a corvette, some smaller vessels, and about thirty-two gun-boats. The power is perfectly absolute; but, as at present exercised, it is far from being arbitrary. The city of Tunis is situated very near the site of Carthage, which gives it considerable interest to travelers.

The Embassy while here made a pretty complete tour of the city, visiting the objects of principal interest. On Friday, the 6th, they visited BRADY'S photographic gallery, where the photograph was taken from which our portraits are drawn. The portrait of the Bey is from a foreign photograph. At the New York Historical Society they found, especially in the Egyptian Department, many objects of great interest. Among the monuments was one in marble which had been forwarded to the Society by Mr. PERRY. The ambassadors visited Wall Street the same day, and in the evening they attended the American Institute Fair. The next day they paid a visit to the establishment of HARPER & BROTHERS, where they were agreeably entertained by the many interesting and to them novel features of a large publishing house.

A. OAKEY HALL.

ABRAHAM OAKEY HALL, whose portrait we publish on page 669, is the District-Attorney of New York city, and has long been a notable jury lawyer, a skillful politician, and a versatile litterateur. Mr. HALL was first elected District-Attorney in 1854 by the Whigs, and again, successively, in 1861 and 1864, on the Democratic ticket. He was a Deputy District-Attorney for years prior to his first election, and has been, during the past fifteen years, engaged either upon the side of the prosecution or of the defense in nearly every metropolitan cause célèbre.

District-Attorney HALL is of an old Knickerbocker family, and graduated at the New York University, of which he is now a Councilman. He attended law lectures under Judge STORY and Professor GREENLEAF at the Harvard Law School, and is now a member of the law firm of BROWN, HALL, and VANDENPOEL. Mr. HALL may be considered a rising man, not only in law and politics but in literature. The pages of Harper's Weekly and Harper's Monthly have from time to time contained many sketches, verses, and novelettes from his pen. His holiday story, entitled "Old Whitey's Christmas Trot," was published in book form, illustrated, in 1857, by HARPER BROTHERS. He is in his fortieth year, and is therefore yet young enough to earn a more than metropolitan fame.

ADVICE GRATIS.

Do you mean what you say—did I hear aright?
Were you in earnest, or in sport?
In love with a Poet? Are you quite
At odds with sanity, to assert
That you—with beauty, and wit, and grace,
Instead of the station these might buy,
Have smilingly set your foot and face
Toward paths where such low blessings lie?

A poet—a maker of verses? One
Who daily coins, for his daily bread,
The blood of his heart in rhymes that run
His brain to fever with fear and dread
Lest that he mar, in speaking it,
The tone of the Voice that came to him
Somewhere out of the Infinite,
Somewhere out of the vast and dim.

You need not answer: I know your thought.
You tell me that since there must be those Whose lips, like the throats of birds, are wrought
Chiefly for music, it follows close
That God—attuning them to such pitch,
Accepts their songs for service—thus Making our sneers at a soul on which
He has laid His pressure pardonous.

And this in a sense is true; but this
Is also mystical; we should take
The world in the gross: we must not miss
Of cue and elegance for the sake
Of dreams and dreamers. And I opine
It would strike fresh heat in your poet's veins
If you dropped some alien into the
They write supremely under a curse.

Will that Invisible Truth of things,
Which shows to us, at some moments, compensate
The lack of the visible comfortings,
The tangible gifts and goods that wait
On steals and talents? Methinks it best—
These vagabond inspirations, or
Hard cash in hand and the sense in the breast
That you have realized what you bargained for?

It is good, no doubt, that a man should be Cast in such weird and singular mould
As dowers his vision with power to see
God's splendors through the gloom where he beheld
Only the haring of lighted gas:
But with a husband I demand
(Letting the gift of prophecy pass)
The coin that is current in the land.

Therefore I should advise you, dear,
To give your lyrical vagrant such
Sufficient hint of a prudent fear
As—without wounding him overmuch—
Will serve to smite his insolent hope
Down to terms of lesser range;
Sending him back to his crowding tropes
Wiser and sadder for the change.

CHAPTER XVII.

A DINNER TETE-A-TETE.

For the first time since he had come into his fortune Telemachus had succeeded in persuading Mentor to take dinner with him. He had invited him to a generous club entertainment, to Richmond dinners, to Blackwall dinners, to snug tête-à-tête dinners at the St. James's Street chambers, and Mentor had systematically and inflexibly declined them, one and all. So the present was quite an eventful occasion; and Telemachus, who by nature rather liked variety for the way in which he entertained his friends, had provided a very elaborate little dinner in honor of his cousin's society.

They met at Saxon's chambers, in St. James's Street. Saxon had ordered flowers on the table, and various kinds of wine in and out of ice on the side-board, and a succession of the most delicate concoctions in the way of fastidious gourmet could desire. These latter, being supplied by a first-rate house in the neighborhood, kept continually arriving in relays, so that the guests were literally right for once, and each dish came "not as a meat, but as a guest."

"Education is a wonderful thing, Saxon," said Mr. Trefalden, when the business of the meal was over, and they were actually themselves with some peaches and pine. "The last time you and I dined together it was at Reichenau. You were very much surprised because I would not let you drink Lafitte and water, and you had never tasted truffles. You called them a nasty black thing. I remember brightly."

"And now I can discriminate between white Hermitage and Chateau Yquem, and appreciate as I ought the genius of the Greeks, who made asparagus a kind of bread!"

"I fear your newly-acquired wisdom will be of little use to you in Norway. By-the-way, you owe me five hundred and sixty pounds."

"What for?"

"Out of oil paintings, worth about two pounds apiece."

And then Mr. Trefalden, laughing at his cousin's astonished face, told him that he had purchased those pictures from Mrs. Riviere.

"I have called upon them twice or thrice," he said, "and each time I have freely paid away your good coin of the realm. I bought four pictures the first time, two the second, and so forth. They seemed very poor, and very glad to get the money."

"They are not more glad than I am," said Saxon. "When did you see them last?"

"About four or five days ago. They were then just starting for Italy, and on the way home, I suppose, some way upon the road. The mother looked ill. She is not in the least like our friend, Lady Castletowers."

"To what part of Italy are they gone?"

"To Nice; where I am to write to them, in case I hear of a purchaser for any more of the paintings. Shall I hear of a purchaser, or do you conceive that you have thrown away enough money for the present?"

"Find the purchaser by all means," replied Saxon. "Five hundred and sixty pounds are soon spent."

"Out of your pure-ases; but such a sum is a little fortune in them."

"I want them to have a hundred a year," said Saxon.

"Which means that our imaginary connoisseur is to spend two thousand pounds. My good fellow, they will never stand it. Be wise."

"Try them. It is so easy to believe in pleasant impossibilities."

"Well, I will see what I can do—after all, they are but women, and women are credulous."

"Don't you think her very pretty?" asked Saxon, somewhat irrelevantly.

To which Mr. Trefalden, holding his wineglass to the light, replied, with great indifference:

"Why, no—not particularly."

"She is like a Raffaelle Madonna!" said Saxon, indignantly.

"Perhaps—but I am no admirer of Madonnas. Olimpia Colonna is ten times handsomer."

Saxon was silent.

"Have you seen the Colonnas since they left Castletowers?" asked Mr. Trefalden, after a pause, in which somewhat curiously.

"No—I have not had time to call upon them. And now all my cantabling about the Campagna!"

Mr. Trefalden had a great deal to tell about the Company; about the offices that were in course of erection at Alexandria and Sidon; about the engineers who were already at work upon the line; about the scientific party that had started for Hit, in search of the hoped-for coal strata; and about the dispatch that was on its way to Bagdad; and, above all, about the wonderful returns that every shareholder might expect to receive in the course of some six or eight years more.

"If I were not bound for Norway," said Saxon, "I would take a trip up the Mediterranean to inspect the works and report progress."

"It would scarcely repay the trouble," replied his cousin. "A year hence there will be more to see. And now farewell to you."

Saxon saw his cousin to the door, and parted from him with reluctance. A few months back he would have kissed him on both cheeks, as on the evening when they had met in Switzerland; but civilization had rubbed off the bloom of his Arcadianism by this time, and he refrained.

He had scarcely returned to his easy, scarcely rung for lights and seated himself at his desk with the intention of writing a few business notes, and arranging his scattered papers, when he heard a cab dash up to the door, a hasty footstep in the entry, and a familiar voice was asking if he were at home. The next moment Lord Castletowers was in the room.

"You here, Castletowers!" cried Saxon. "Has any thing happened?"

"Only this," replied his friend. "Colonna is summoned to Palermo, and must go. He had intended to cross to Sicily from Genoa; but some spiteful fool has told him that I am warned that he is liable to arrest if seen in any French or Sardinian port. Now I come to ask if you will take him over?"

"To Sicily?"

"Yes—round by Gibraltar. It is Colonna's only safe route; and we could steer northward as soon as we had landed our man. Do you mind doing this?"

"Not in the least. I would as soon sail in one direction as another—say, I had far sooner steer southward, for the weather, if that be all."

"Then it is settled?"

"Quite—if Signor Colonna will meet us at Portsmouth early to-morrow. I thought you hated the cause, Castletowers, and would do no more for it."

The Earl smiled sadly.

"One may quarrel with liberty as often as Horace with Lydia," said he; "but one can no more help caring for it than Sierra Nevada and the Spanish Islands, green with orange and citron, rose one by one out of the blue sea, gilded past, and sank away again in the distance. Sometimes no land was visible on either side. Sometimes the little vessel sped along as quickly as a bird, with no land at hand, lands, that those on board could hear the chiming of the convent-bells, and the challenge of the sentinels posted on the summits of the seawashed forts. But for the most part they kept well off the shore, steering direct for Sicily. And all this time the two friends mainly lived on deck, acquiring nautical knowledge, growing daily more and more intimate, and leaving Signor Colonna to fill page after page of close and crabbed manuscript in the cabin below. It was a delicious time, Saxon. The days splendors and the nights all stars, and the travelers slept to the pleasant music of the waves.

"Lend me your glass, Trefalden," said Lord Castletowers. "I want to look at that steam frigate. I can make out her flag."

They had been several days at sea, and were within about eighteen hours' sail of Palermo. A faint blue headland far away to the left marked the southernmost point of the island of Sardinia; while straight ahead, trailing a banner of pale smoke behind her, came the frigate that had attracted Lord Castletower's attention.

"She seems to be coming our way," said Saxon.

"She is bearing right down upon us," replied the Earl. "And she carries guns—I don't quite like the look of her."

"Do you mean it?"

"I do."

And Lord Castletowers went to the top of the main stairs and called to Colonna to come up.

"I want you just to glance at this steamer through Trefalden's glass," said he. "Will you mind giving me your opinion of her?"

"Not at all," replied the Italian, and came at once on deck.

His face darkened at sight of the approaching steamer. He took the glass; adjusted the focus; looked for some ten seconds silently and steadily, and returned it with but a single word of comment.

"Neapolitan."

"Good God!" exclaimed Castletowers, "what is to be done?"

Signor Colonna hesitated a moment before replying; but when his words came they were quick and decisive.

"If the captain has a motive in bearing down upon us, I am the object of his search. But he can not be alongside for at least ten minutes. I will hide my Excellency. If Mr. Trefalden will lend me one of his pilot coats, and you will both call me Sir Thomas Wylde, I have no fear of detection. I speak English quite well enough to deceive any Neapolitan. I have done it before, in worse circumstances than this. Remember—Sir Thomas Wylde. I have a passport made out in that name in case it is asked for."

And with that he plunged back into the cabin; gathered his letters and papers into a handkerchief and hid them in a corner of the entrance; disguised the saxon's blue over-coat as gorgeous with anchor buttons; lit a short clay pipe; pulled down a little forward over his brow; lay down at full length on a sofa in the cabin; and waited patiently.

"She has signaled us to lie to!" cried Lord Castletowers, down the cabin stairs.

"Lie to, then, by all means."

"And her captain seems to be coming on board."

"He is very welcome."

Lord Castletowers smiled, in spite of his anxiety.

"That man is as cool as an iceberg," said he to Saxon. "And yet he knows he will be swinging from the topmost tower of St. Elmo within forty-eight hours if those papers recognize him!"

And now the great frigate towered alongside the tiny yacht, frowning down with all her portholes, and crowded with armed men.

A ladder was then lowered over the ship's side, and the Neapolitan commander and one of his officers alighted.

The Neapolitan was perfectly polite, and apologized for his intrusion with the best bred air in the world. He requested to know the name and destination of the yacht, the name of her owner, and the names of all persons on board.

Lord Castletowers, who assumed the office of spokesman, replied in fluent Italian. The name of the yacht was the Albula; she was the property of Mr. Trefalden, who was cruising in the Mediterranean with friends Lord and Lady Castletowers and Sir Thomas Wylde. They had no object whatever in view save their own pleasure, and could not say to what direction they might be going. Probably to Athens. Quite as probably to Constantinople. Their passports were at the signor capitano's disposition, should he desire to see them.

The signor capitano bowed and inquired if Milord Trefalden had any intention of landing in Sicily?

The Earl replied that Mr. Trefalden would probably put in at Marsala for fresh water.

Milord carries no arms, no gunpowder, no munitions of war?

Only the brass swivel which the signor capitano perceived on the forward deck.

The Neapolitan explained that he was under the necessity of requesting permission to glance into the hold, accordingly quite unarmed for his inspection. He then asked leave to see the cabin, and went down, accompanied by Trefalden and Castletowers, leaving his officer on deck.

"Our friend Sir Thomas Wylde," said the Earl, with an introductory wave of the hand.

Colonna, who was still lying on the sofa, with his pipe in his mouth, and an old Times newspaper in his hand, lifted up his head at these words, rose lazily, made a very stiff bow, and said nothing. The Neapolitan commander returned the bow, made some pleasant remark on the gentleness of the pretty little cabin, and again apologized for the trouble he had given.

The present insurrection, he explained, compelled his Majesty's government to keep strict watch upon all vessels sailing toward Sicily. It was not an agreeable service for the officers of his Majesty's navy; but it was a very necessary one. He believed that he had now but one duty left to perform. He must trouble milords to hear him read a little proclamation containing the description of one Giulio Colonna, a noted political offender, for whose apprehension his Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies offered a reward of two thousand piastres. The said Giulio Colonna, he might add, was supposed to be even now on his way to Palermo.

He then drew a paper from his pocket-book, and, removing his hat, read aloud in the tones of his sovereign a very minute and accurate inventory of Signor Colonna's outward man, describing his eyes, nose, mouth, teeth, hair, beard, mustache, height, and complexion; to all of which Signor Colonna listened with a placid composure that might have deceived Archimedes himself.

"What is all that about?" said he in English, when the officer had finished reading. "I do not understand Italian, you know."

Saxon could hardly forbear laughing outright while Castletowers gravely translated the proclamation for the benefit of the supposed Sir Thomas.

Colonna smiled and shrugged his shoulders.

"Either I am dead—or hopeless quest. They might as well try to catch a swallow on the wing!"

Whereupon the signor capitano, understanding the tone and gesture, though not the words, drew himself up, and replied, with some little assumption of dignity, that the man in question was a notorious traitor, and certain to fall into the hands of justice before long.

His duty was left in the calm somewhat less graciously than he had entered it, and Lord Castletowers, following him upon deck, took occasion to apologize for his friend.

"Sir Thomas is drunk," he said; "but then the English are drunk."

To which the Neapolitan replied by a well-turned compliment to himself, and took his leave. He then returned to his ship, followed by his lieutenant; the ladder was drawn up; final salutations were exchanged; the steam frigate bore off with a fiery puff from her funnel; and in a few minutes the strip of blue sea between the two vessels had widened to the space of half a mile.

"Hurrah!" shouted the Earl. "Come up, Sir Thomas Wylde! Come up, and have a glass for Francesco Secondo! You are safely past Scylla this time."

"Sir Thomas Wylde," replied Colonna, divesting himself of Saxon's blue coat, and answering from below, "Do you know why I did not come on deck?"

"No."

"Because I caught a glimpse of that lieutenant's face as he jumped on board."

"Do you know him?"

"Perfectly. His name is Galeotti. He used to profess liberalism a dozen years ago; and he was my secretary in Rome in forty-eight."

CHAPTER LIX.

PALERMO.

A GIGANTIC curve of rippling blue sea—an irregular crescent of amber sand—a golden cimeter laid down beside the waves—a vast area of cultivated slopes, rising terrace above terrace, and basking in the sunshine of dusky olives, and, higher still, dense covers of chestnut and ilex—around and above all, circling in the scene from east to north, the amphitheatre of mountains, all verdure below, all barrenness above, whose vast arms clasp round in the voluptuous sea, and whose purple peaks stand in serrated outline against the soft blue sky.

"The bay of Sicily!"

Such was the exclamation that burst from the lips of the two younger men, as the Albula rounded the northland of Cape Gallo about five o'clock in the afternoon of the day following their encounter with the Neapolitan frigate. They had expected to be beating up all day for the last hour, silent and expectant, held out his arms, as if the whole fair land were inclosed the glorious panorama, and murmured something which might have been a salutation or a prayer.

"Yes, the bay of Sicily!" repeated Lord Castletowers, with enthusiasm. "The loveliest bay in Europe, let the Neapolitan say what he will! Look—there is Monte Pellegrino; and in the Monte Pellegrino, crowned with the shrine of Santa Rosalia—yonder, in that mountain gorge, lies Monreale. And this part which is now passing is called the Conca d'Oro. See, there are the domes of Palermo already coming into view!"

"And there," said Colonna, pointing to a fing lingering lazily from the top of a tall pole at a little tower close down upon the strand, "there, Heaven be praised, is the tricolor of Italy!"

And now, as the yacht drew on, the compact forest of spires and pinnacles, glittering domes and white-fronted palaces rose, as it were, out of the bay at their approach. The shore next on the Molo flung up his cap and shouted: "Viva Garibaldi!" while the quays and streets swarmed with large and small craft of every description; speronaroes, felucces, steamers, and open boats, every one of which displayed the national flag conspicuously on mast or bowsprit. The quays were crowded with red shirts, Sardinian uniforms, and military priests; and close against the landing-place, under the shadow of Fort Gelisa, stood a large body of Garibaldines, perhaps a thousand in number, leaning on their muskets, and chattering with the most undisciplined vivacity imaginable. As Saxon and Colonna glided in under the bows of a great ungainly English steamer some ten or a dozen of the red shirts stepped coolly out of the ranks and came to the verge of the quay to reconnoitre these newcomers.

At that moment an Italian officer, leaning over the side of the steamer, cried:

"Ecco il Colonna!"

The name was heard by one of the soldiers on the quay. It flew from lip to lip; it swelled into a shout; the shout was answered, the shout repeated, redoubled, till the air rang with it, and the walls of the fortress gave it back again. In an instant the landing-place was surrounded; the dock of every vessel in the harbor became suddenly alive with men; and still the mighty welcome gathered voice:

"Colonna! Colonna!"

He bared his head to their greeting; but scarcely one in each thousand could see him where he stood. Thus several seconds passed, and the shouts were growing momentarily more passionate and impatient, when the accommodation ladder of the great steamer was suddenly lowered, and a young officer came springing down.

"Honored Signore," he said, cap in hand, "his Excellency General Garibaldi is on board, and entreats that you will step on deck."

Pale with emotion, Colonna turned to Saxon and the latter, and said:

"Follow me."

But they would not.

"No, no;" replied Castletowers. "Go up alone—it is better so. We will meet by-and-by."

"At the Trinacria, then!"

"At the vessel Trinacria."

So Colonna went alone up the side of the City of Aberdeen, and from the midst of a group of red-shirted officers upon her upper deck there stepped forth one more bronzed and weatherbeaten than the rest, who took him by both hands and welcomed him as a brother.

At this sight the shout became a roar—windows were thrown up, and balconies thronged in all the houses round about the harbor—the troops on the quay fell back into position, and presently arrived—and the first of an impromptu salute of twenty-one guns was fired from Fort Gallita.

The two young men looked at each other, and smiled. They had been shouting like the rest, till they were hoarse; and now, as Colonna turned to his friend and said, "Shall we get quietly away, Castletowers, before the storm has subsided?"—the Earl caught at the idea, and proceeded at once to act upon it.

They then sheered off from the City of Aberdeen; hoisted their yacht close under the stern; beckoned to the nearest boatman; and were rowed, unnoticed, to a landing-place a little farther down the harbor.

"And now, Trefoldan," said Lord Castletowers, when they had decently fouled themselves on shore, "now for a race over Palermo!"

"Scusate," said a pleasant voice; "but will you accept a guide?"

It was the young officer of the City of Aberdeen, who had followed them unseen, and overtaken them before they landed.

In a moment they had all three shaken hands, and were chatting as joyously and freely as if they had known each other for weeks instead of minutes.

"Have you ever been in Palermo before?" asked the latter.

"Once, about four years ago," replied the Earl.

"Ah, Dio! it is sadly changed. You can not see from the vessel what the open destruction must have been; but up by the Piazza Nuova the place is one heap of desolation—churches, convents, palaces all destroyed, and hundreds of corpses yet lying unburied in the ruins! But we mean to take our revenge at Melazzo."

"Melazzo?" repeated Saxon. "Where is that?"

"What! Do you not know?"

"We know nothing," said Castletowers, eagerly—"nothing of what has happened since we left England. Tell us about Melazzo."

They had been turning their backs upon the harbor, and proceeding in the direction of the Strada Nuova, but at these words the young friend seized them each by the arm, and hurried them back to the quay.

"You are the vessel steamer?" he exclaimed, pointing to the City of Aberdeen. "That steamer on board of which his Excellency invited the Colonna?"

"Yes."

"And those troops drawn up against the landing-place?"

"Yes, yes."

"Well, they are all picked men; the last twelve hundred of the expedition. They are now waiting to go on board, and by ten o'clock to-night will be out of the bay. Then the vessel Cosenz and his Cacciatori are already gone—they were steaming; but Garibaldi himself goes with us in the City of Aberdeen. Melazzo is not far—we shall be there before daybreak; but they are there will be no fighting till the day after to-morrow."

"Why, this is glorious!" cried Saxon.

"Yes, we are in luck to drop in for a siege the day after your arrival," replied the Sicilian. "I have been here for nearly three weeks, and have had nothing to do yet, except to assist at the demolition of the Castello, and that was not amusing. But I will venture enough for the first hour or two; but one soon gets tired of pulling down stone-walls when there are no Regi behind them."

He then led the way back to the Toledo, pointing out those places where the struggle had been fiercest, and most and unavenged cruelties had been perpetrated, with a pleasant talk with the simple vivacity of a boy.

His name he said, was Silvio Benti. He was the second son of a Palermitan land-owner on the other side of the island, and had the misfortune of aid-de-camp in the Garibaldian army. He had fought last year as a volunteer at Solferino; but had no intention of becoming a soldier by profession. Fighting for liberty was one thing; but fighting for four pauls a day was another. He meant to cultivate olives and vines, and live the pastoral life of his forefathers, if he did not happen to get shot before the end of the campaign.

Chattering thus, he led Saxon and Castletowers through the chief streets of the city; and a terrible sight it was for eyes unused to the horrors of war. Here were the remnants of the famous barricades of the 27th of May; here the shattered walls of the university, the Pretorio pitted with shot-holes, and the monastery of the Seven Angels, of which a mere shell remained. Then came a stately palace, roofless and windowless—the blackened foundations of a church once famous for its archives—a whole street propped, and threatening to fall at every moment—the entire quarter round the Castello, in which the helpless sisters had been burned alive beyond the possibility of escape. In some places scarcely one stone was left standing on another. In some the fiery storm had passed by and left no trace of its course.

Presently, from a broad space of indistinguishable ruin, pestilent with unburied dead, they emerged upon one where the people were even gay with promenaders and the cafés crowded with idlers; where the national flag floated gayly from the roofs of the public buildings, and all the butterfly business of South Italian life was going on as merrily as if the ten-inch shell were a phenomenon unknown, and the Paixhan was unknown to Sicilian ears.

Saxon could not comprehend how these people should be eating ices and playing at dominoes, as if nothing had happened of late to disturb their equanimity. It seemed to him inexpressibly shocking and heartless; and not being accustomed to conceal his opinions, he said so, very bluntly.

The Sicilian smiled and shrugged his shoulders.

"They are so happy to be free," he replied, apologetically.

"But what right have they to be happy while their dead lie unburied at their very doors?" asked Saxon, indignantly. "What right have they to forget the hundreds of innocent women and children crushed and burned in their homes, or the Neapolitans who massacred them?"

"Ah, Dio, mio! they pay them out at Melazzo," was the quick reply.

And this was the Sicilian temperament. Benti, like Garibaldi, like the Earl with pity and horror brought but a passing cloud upon the brow of their new acquaintance. He had seen them daily for three weeks, and grown familiar with them. He talked and laughed in the very presence of deadly scratchings by the barricades; showed where the Regi had been repulsed, and at which point the Garibaldians had come to the shattered church or cession of Nice, the probable duration of the war, the priests, the shirts, the foreign volunteers, and all the thousand and one things connected with the revolutionary cause; and thought a great deal more of the coming expedition than of the late bombardment.

At length, just as they came out upon the Marina, and saw the vessel Cosenz with all their Sicilian friend bade them a hasty farewell.

"That is our signal for the steamer to depart," said he. "I must go. Addio! Addio! My work is begun ask for me. I may be able to do something for you. At all events, I will try."

"We won't forget that promise!" replied Saxon, eagerly.

"Addio, fratelli."

And from young men who looked forward to the coming fight as if it were a pleasure party, who were laughing at danger as a mere matter of horse ago, but who were brought into contact by accident, and into sympathy by their love of liberty, they separated as friends who had met by common cause, embraced and parted, literally, as brothers.

The friends then went straight to the Trinacria hotel, and learning that Colonna had not yet arrived, turned at once toward the quay. There they found a dense crowd assembled round the City of Aberdeen with her steam up and all the troops on board.

The people were frothing over with excitement, and so densely packed that the young men might be reasonably thankful that they owed their way through a stone-wall as through the solid human mass interposed between themselves and the vessel. Even the Earl's height saved him from the exclamations of those around them that the troops were drawn up on deck, and that Garibaldi was known to be on the bridge. Now and then a shout was raised for some officer who appeared for a moment on deck; and sometimes, perceiving nothing else doing, a voice from the crowd would give the signal for a storm of vivas.

Presently an officer of Cacciatori, with the well-known plume of cock's feathers in his hat, came hurrying from the vessel, and, being recognized right and left, as if by magic, and he passed through amidst a shower of benedictions and adieus.

"Do you know who that is?" asked Saxon of those around.

"No—God bless him!" said one.

"We only know that he is going to fight for Italy," said another.

"The Holy Virgin and all the saints have him in their keeping!" added a third.

At this moment the troops on board suddenly back again—a great roar burst from the thousand-throated throng—a gun was fired—and the City of Aberdeen was under way.

In another second the mass had wavered, parted, turned like a mighty tide, and began following out through the Porta Felice, and following the course of the steamer along the Marina Promenade. The soldiers on board stood motionless, with their hands to the sides of their hats, saluting the crowd. The crowd raced tumultuously along the shore, weeping, raving, clapping its hands for the soldiers, and shouting "Viva Garibaldi! Viva la Liberta!" One woman fell in the press and died. Not another little infant in her arms, and prayed aloud for the liberators.

Saxon and the Earl stood still, side by side, looking after the lessening steamer, and listening to the shouts which grew momentarily fainter and more distant.

"Good Heavens!" said Castletowers, "what a terrific thing human emotion is, when one beholds it on such a scale as this! I should have liked to see this people demolishing the Castello."

Saxon drew a deep breath before replying, and when he spoke his words were no answer to the Earl's remark.

"I tell you what it is, Castletowers," he said; "I feel as if we had no business to remain here another hour. For God's sake, let us buy a couple of red shirts, and be after the rest as fast as the little Ahola can get us through the water!"

CASTLES.

THERE is a picture in my brain
That only fades to come again;
The sunlight, through a veil of rain,
To leward gilding;
A narrow reach of barren sea and
A light-house half a league from land;
And two young lovers, hand in hand,
A castle building.

Upon the budded apple-trees
The robins sing by twos and threes,
And seven at the faintest breeze
Leave their blossoms;
And ever would that lover be
The wind that robs the bourgeoned tree
And lifts the soft trees daintily
On Beauty's bosom.

Ah, graybeard, what a happy thing
It was, when life was in its spring,
To peep through Love's betrothal ring
At Life's fair vistas;
To move and breathe in magic air,
To think that all that seems is fair!
Ah, trip on, youth, and golden hair,
Thou pretty vision!

Well, well—I think not on these two
But the old wound breaks out anew,
And the old dream, as if 'twere true,
In my brain castles;
Then tears come welling to my eyes,
For yonder, all in saintly guise,
As lovers, a cold woman lies
Upon the trestles!

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

NEW YORK is always invaded with foreigners—not mayoy with the polite French and gray-faced Germans, but Chinese, Japanese, and Egyptians, and specimens of our thoroughfares, quite at home. Recently a novel addition has been made to the list of "foreigners"—a number—an embassy from the Bey of Tunis to President Johnson. In appearance they are Creoles, and men not of culture, speaking the French language fluently. Accompanied by Mr. Perry, the American Consul at the coast of Tunis, they arrived in this country bearing messages of congratulation on the termination of the war, and sympathy in the death of President Lincoln.

They have been making a tour of our city, strolling through Broadway, running over Central Park, and right-seeing generally. The object will be interesting to us—the chief impression they made upon these foreign gentlemen. We are the civilized, but yet the barbarous, which pleased the Tunisians, but the sweet fraus, the bright eyes, the ruby lips and glowing cheeks attracted them. Unlike in their country, they are strive to secure more of the so-called improvements of art, and though the Tunisian has land rich in the fertility of the soil, and capacity for such a succession of waterfalls as dashed about on the Avenue and in the Park. In fact, it required the nestest care on the part of the Consul to prevent the ladies going to them.

By-the-way, ladies, have you seen the latest novelty in the crinoline line? If not, by visiting the American Institute Fair you may have the opportunity of examining it.

The Empress Eugenie has successfully overtaken in carrying the steel hoops with a wrapping of very fine German silver wire, which, as is usually the case, is found by the exhibitors claim that by this arrangement their skirt is much more durable and flexible, more graceful, and more effective than any other skirt now in the market.

It is really too late to regret it now, but if you have not chosen to see Bierstadt's great picture, you have lost a great mistake. He steps into the midst of the audience with the utmost unconcern, shakes his head sadly, exhibits his empty pockets, strikes his arms together violently, and then drawing a handkerchief over his outstretched arm, produces a most succulent and highly glazed brisket of water and gold-foil—veal and genuine cheese. The last trick which he attempted upon one gentleman's hat more hoop-skirts, five rabbits, goblets, and lighted lanterns than fifty hats could possibly hold—was one of the most successful of all his feats, if we except making a cage-full of canaries disappear from the cage and appear simultaneously in the pages of books. It is more like magic than sleight of hand, and the modus operandi is entirely unsuspected. Conjuring is beautiful, from the rapidity and grace with which the transformation is made.

Nothing is more delightful—to the ladies at least, and the gentlemen do not seem averse to it—than a walk down Broadway some of these charming autumn days. The shops are filled with the gay-colored autumn dress, and you don't need to look into the top-windows to see them almost put down on the pavement—you can see them at a glance enough adorning the fair promenaders. There are so many curious varieties of hats and bonnets that one wonders where they all come from, and is puzzled to decide whether they are pretty or not. Stay! that one is pretty indeed—a pure white hat of velvet, or some such material, trimmed with blue velvet, and a long blue veil at the side. Those side-veils give a very graceful air, but we protest against the custom of covering the last pointy with a veil entirely placed together behind. It is done a sensible purpose only, who has attained to her own aggregate head-covering in her hand-box and has to take her bonnet from the hat-tree—really there is not a shade of distinction.

Every body is proud of our beautiful Park, and is interested in whatever in and about it contributes to its attractions. Therefore we mention the fact that Professor Lowe is preparing an elegant bridal car to accommodate some romantic pair, who desire to have their happiness consummated in a balloon. The ceremony will be performed after the balloon has ascended twelve feet. Then, after partaking of a sumptuous collation, provided by the Professor, the yet unknown, but doubtless happy pair, will commence their airy bridal tour.

Who will be the fortunate couple?

To read the court records of the day, and the awful developments of domestic infelicity, one would think we made any young lady say "No" when the question is "popped." Matrimony is the very worst business that a man in this lady's chance thus to reply. However, somebody thinks there are two sides to the question, as the following will show:

MATRIMONY SPREAD SINGLE BLESSEDNESS.—Matrimony is but hard work—a life of toil and pain, comfortable slippers, smoking coffee, round arms, red lips, kind words, shirts studding to buttons, delicious suppers, soft beds, happiness, etc. Hurrah!

Single blessedness—chest-iron quills, blue noses, frosty rooms, ice in the pitcher, unpressurized linen, restless socks, office crammed with icicles, gusts outside blinds, flabby steaks, dull razors, corns, coughs, colics, rhubarb, misery, etc. Ugh!

Those good housekeepers, who are terrified at the fearful price of butter occasioned by the rebellion, will learn that, in Philadelphia recently, an entrepreneur met with summary punishment.

A dealer in butter in the Grand Avenue Market distributed every body by demanding one dollar a pound for his lump butter. A lady offered to give him ninety-five cents, but the dealer refused, and while the lady was talking with him the rest of the market-men and women commenced to examine the lumps offered for sale. Each lump was weighed, and the dealer pocketed, and with them, in the number of forty, was found to be under weight. A mere delighted crowd was never seen than when the lady marched off with the entire lot in his basket.

It was a beautiful as well as a wise idea of our city ministers presented last Sunday evening in an address on the training of children. It was given as a quotation: "I think it well to prejudice my children in favor of virtue and vices, or corn and wheat, if I would keep out the weeds."

Those fashionable mothers, who commit to nurses the exclusive care of their little ones, will learn a lesson from the following:

A MODEL MOTHER.—According to a Court Journal the Princess of Wales is a very pattern for mothers: "It is whispered about that the Princess of Wales is now nursing the mother of the 'future King of England' may be seen in a fashionable part of the order Princess of Wales and put on baby's night-clothes and see him safely in bed."

Edmund About says that fashionable French mothers do nursing for an age, and that nobody pretends to and twenty minutes a day to their little family. It is a matter of law that they shall not do it for more than that.

But there is another side—all mothers accuse the waters are not the only ones and papers filled with the awful tales of cruelty to children. Running the eye over a single English paper we glean the following—mere leadings to paragraphs.

SHOCKING MURDER OF AN INFANT. MURDER OF THREE CHILDREN AND SUICIDE. HARROWING DISCOVERY. ANOTHER CASE OF INFANTAM TREACHERY. FOIBOTHS OF MURDER. ANOTHER INFANT MURDERESS. ATTEMPTED MURDER. CHILD SUFFOCATED IN A BOX OF FEATHERS.

The naked truth is with a little variation from a recital of wholesale "Murder of the Innocents."

The English people complain because the Queen secludes herself from the public gaze, and yet when she does appear she is hooted and hissed.

Eugénie seems to be ambitious of literary distinction as well as her royal husband. It is currently reported that she has written a history of the French revolution in the Spanish language. The Empress, it is said, has received from the Queen of Spain the title of Duchess of Alba of Castile"—with what truth we can not say.

Who will hereafter say that false hair is not useful? A LOVE OF HAIR LEADS TO MATRIMONY.—Mrs. Catherine Claussen, a Parisian lady, while traveling in her carriage with her husband, Baron Claussen, was suddenly robbed of a coachman, who had incurred her displeasure. He struck at her head with a hatchet, but the blow was warded off, who afterward attended her declared that her life was saved by the quantity of false hair she wore.

Royalty can not insure happiness, nor the gratification of one's wishes.

The unfortunate ills of Queen Victoria has been much disturbed of late in consequence of the proposed marriage of her daughter Princess Helena. Helena, as a young princess young lady, she remembers her mother in appearance and disposition, and the other of the Duke of Argyle. She recently believed in London that the Princess Helena was about to marry Lord Lorne, instead of a young gentleman, and this fact was sufficient to make her specify alliance with the Duke of Argyle. The Queen, it appears, is not necessarily, in order to prevent the deepening of her affection for a person who does not like her, a disagreeable country. Now there seems to be two candidates in the field for the hand of the Princess of Denmark—one, the objectionable by the Queen, and the Crown Prince of Holland. The latter is a young man of fine personal appearance and handsome young fellow, more acceptable to the young Princess than the Queen. He has appointed him as an opposite door, just enough sight of her departing robes. Poor Victoria! Poor Queen!

The following incident carries its own lesson—so often we hear it:

A TRAGIC WEDDING.—The town of Kaschau, in Hungary, has just been the scene of a tragic event. It is the custom there for the bride to be escorted by a young lady of the town, and on the day fixed for the nuptials of Miss Ilona Kiss, a young lady of great beauty in Kaschau, preceded by a band of music, and followed by a large train of friends, left the house where she was served after the ceremony, one of the guests invited with the bridegroom to the maiden dignitary. The bride, who had gone to the church on foot, was conducted home in a carriage. Dinner was served after the usual manner, and ran away, laughing as she went. Her husband followed her with a whip, and exclaimed in a loud tone, "Come here, Ilona, or I will fire!" The bride heard the words, but replied, "Fire, if you will." The shot went off but instant, and the poor girl fell mortally wounded; and the husband, who had never before suffered from such a misfortune that she felt certain he did not know the rifle was loaded.

AFOOT.

In life's a journey—as we see
This indeed by many a token—
Oh, then, I trow, the road will be
Not always smooth or always broken.
But march we over rugged stone,
Or march we over trodden gravel,
With friends around us, or alone,
We must keep moving on our travel.
Tramp, tramp, when skies are fair,
Tramp, tramp, when storms are blowing.
If we find
We lag behind
A steadfast heart will keep us going.

Many a path will seem most plain,
Many a sign will point the reason;
But hold thine own with might and main,
And keep the track that thou hast chosen.
It's in the light and in the dark,
It's over hill and through the hollow;
We'll fix our eyes upon the mark,
And if we can not lead we'll follow.
Tramp, tramp, when skies are fair,
Tramp, tramp, when storms are blowing.
If our strength
Should fail at length
A steadfast heart will keep us going.

The horseman and the charioteer
Go hasting by with mighty clatter;
God-speed them all! and if they veer
The reins to-day, what does it matter?
Grudge them not the present hour,
Nor faint and murmur like a craven,
For victory is the end and the power
There is for all a common haven.
Tramp, tramp, when skies are fair,
Tramp, tramp, when storms are blowing.
As the light
Dies down to night
A steadfast heart will keep us going.

BRAZIL.

A NUMBER of engravings in the middle of our paper this week illustrate some important features and picturesque scenes in the new of great interest in Brazil. For the interesting views and portraits to which we allude we are indebted to Mr. H. M. LANE, whose long residence in Brazil has made him familiar with the customs of the people and with the history of the country.

On first seeing the town of Rio Janeiro from the deck of the steamer the mind of the voyager is filled with the grandeur of the picture which it presents. Not that there is much to admire in the town itself—it is the beauty of its surroundings; the brilliant sky, the blue land-locked sea which fills its bay; the picturesque appearance of the Pao d'Assucar, at the entrance of the port; the white walls of the vessels lying along under the steep and massive pressure of the breeze; and, beyond the city, the various tints of the foliage of the magnificent trees, and the bolder shape of the hills, which stretch out so charmingly against the rich blue sky. Seen from this position, the city looks very pretty, and there is a general eagerness to get ashore, which is only equaled by the desire to get away from it after a lengthened residence therein. Built-of-brick dirty streets, abounding in smells—compared with which that rising from the worst streets in New York in the hottest weather is a refreshing perfume—mean-looking houses, and a not over-clean population, do not make a very favorable impression on the stranger who lands among them. It is true there are a few buildings, public and otherwise, which present a respectable appearance, but these are not in sufficient number to redeem the less attractive features of the city.

The origin of Brazil is very far indeed from being the compact country it appears on the map, and its immense extent renders the want of roads more serious and material to its prosperity. So difficult is it to travel in the interior of the empire that a very large portion is occupied in the possession of a dispatch from the seat of government to the most distant province and the return of the messenger. Practically all communication between the capital and the immense basin of the Amazon is by sea, and until recently there was immense difficulty in passing from the cities on the coast to the dwellers on the higher plateaux, and a good deal of danger, the forests which intervene being occupied by wild and savage tribes.

DON PEDRO II. D'ALCANTARA is the second Emperor of Brazil. He was born at the port of Santa Christovao, in the outskirts of Rio, December 2, 1825. His early studies were directed by the venerable José BONIFACIO D'ANDRADA, called the PATRIARCH of Brazil, a wise and learned statesman and scholar. He found in young PEDRO an apt scholar, and in the Emperor a man justly entitled for his present liberal government. Very early in life the Emperor showed signs of enormous ability and that rare discernment which characterizes his later years. In 1840 he was called upon to ascend the throne and take the full prerogative. He was then only fourteen years of age.

It must be admitted that DON PEDRO II. fully comprehends the various of the resources of the country he governs, and that he has set to work in the right way to develop them. The great purpose of his life seems to be to elevate the population to the position of a free people. During his reign Brazil has taken immense strides in every progress. She has already six important railroads, and among them some master-pieces of engineering; many fine manufactured turnpikes; a semi-nautical line of first-class sea-going steamers running from the Amazon and the La Plata, touching at all the principal points on the coast; numerous small coast lines, and steamers running the entire length of the navigable Amazon, also steamboats on almost every navigable river of the Empire. Nearly all these enterprises are subsidized. The capital—Rio Janeiro—possesses nearly all the improvements to be found in European or North American cities. The literary and scientific institutions of Brazil rank very high. Throughout the entire length and breadth of the Empire the rights of individuals are guaranteed; there is perfect liberty of speech; the press is free; all religions are tolerated; nearly all the officers are elected by the people; and though the form of government is monarchical, the people are as free as it is possible for a people to be with safety to themselves.

Dom Pedro is considerably over six feet in height, muscular and well developed, with handsome German features and a fine eye. In his habits he is simple and unpretending. His life is a fine scholar, and cultivates assiduously the arts and sciences, and is a warm patron of scientific and literary institutions. He has also been a warm friend of free public schools, which has no equal in America outside of the United States; and he is a warm friend of religious toleration, and has given his personal aid to erect Protestant chapels for the German colonists. He is a liberal Catholic in principle, and is thoroughly acquainted with our literature. Last year he sent to WHITTIER an autograph translation of the "Cry of the Lost."

The Emperor is a fine conversationalist, and speaks fluently six languages; is a thorough classical scholar, and a good typographical compositor. PROFESSOR AGASSIZ upon his arrival in Brazil found in the Emperor a kind friend and warm supporter. The latter ordered telegraphic dispatches to be sent to him and his party over all the Government lines in the Empire, and placed at his disposal a steamer to explore the AMAZON. The Emperor's ideas of the abolition of slavery are well known. On cession of the province of Rio Grande Pedro has liberated a large number of slaves. Within the last ten years the number of slaves has decreased more than one-third. The Emperor's own liberal lives; so that to-day, at the highest calculation, there are not more than two millions of slaves in the empire.

Brazilian slaves are of every hue, from the deep black of the African to the light olive-brown complexion of the plusher himself; and but for the suppression of the slave-trade, they would have soon outnumbered the freemen, and would be already ready in the coast provinces—and then we might have expected a servile war and a repetition of the horrors of St. Domingo. Many of the Brazilians are said not to have the slightest idea that there is any thing wrong in holding a fellow-man in bondage. The Government has taken measures from whose labors it derives a portion of its revenue; consequently, when the slaves of them as the property of the particular saint to whom the establishment is dedicated; the Foundling Hospital occasionally has a number of children, and especially efective ators said to buy those that are sick, on the chance of restoring them and making a profit by their aid. It must be a source of grief these treat the slave with animosity. They regard him with the same kind of feeling as that with which we look upon a horse or ox. They treat him with as much indulgence that in some respects his condition is better than that of the free laborer. Besides the Sunday, he has several days in the course of the year on which to enjoy himself, and in many cases is allowed a piece of ground to cultivate his own little piece of land, the Saturday.

The cities are full of slaves and free colored people. Walking in the streets of any of the cities, you meet with troops of these, headed by one of their number rattling a cabasah containing pebbles or shells, dancing, singing, laughing, and moving with surprising ease and elasticity. So general is this music that it is a matter of surprise Brazilians who have been accustomed to it all their lives compliance of it, and the legislature once ordered it to be put down; but the effort was in vain. The fate of this edict was so injurious to the slaves that it had to be repealed. They lost their animation and their strength, moved about like drowsy drones, and wasted so rapidly as to make it quite painful to look at them. The restoration of the music and dancing was hailed with universal delight, and gave the physiologist an opportunity of arriving at some wonderful conclusions regarding the power of the nervous system over the physical. A very large proportion of the colored population of the cities are free; thus many slaves purchase their freedom, and at liberty to employ themselves as they please, subject to the payment of a fixed sum per day to their owners. The rest of their earnings are put in their own disposal, and as the value of an able-bodied slave seldom exceeds $1000, it is in the power of almost all of them to purchase their freedom at some time or other. Meanwhile they are at full liberty to cultivate their own little plot of land disposed, the man who instructs them being under no pecuniary obligation of receiving a dressing of tar and feathers, or a gentle glance of the sun's rays.

The Empress, DONNA THERESA, is a sister of the late King of the Two Sicilies. She is a lady of high intellectual mind, possessed of all the qualities of a kind and truly noble princess. She is a good musician, and her numberless charities and personal solicitude for the welfare of much have endeared herself to the hearts of all the Brazilians.

Friendly relations exist with Paraguay until the accession of LOPEZ, who proposed to join the Spanish American nations would join him against Brazil, ingnu very soon to show himself treacherous and violated the spirit of the treaty by erecting a strong fortification at the mouth of the Paraguay; and when the Brazil for the purpose interfered in the affairs of the La Plata, in the pursuit of her legitimate interests and to protect her citizens from repeated aggressions, LOPEZ declared war against Lorez took occasion to capture an unsuspecting merchant steamer on the Paraguay, and to invade the Province of Matto-Grosso, committing depredations and ravages on every hand.

Paraguay is without doubt one of the most despotically governed countries in the world. Congress has not only once in ten years; then the Deputies are virtually LOPEZ'S creatures. Liberty is the only merchant who can have relations with the outside world. He has complete control of all public and private property. No one can marry without his consent, none can leave the country without his permission.

This is the third time Brazil has interfered in the affairs of the La Plata. First, in 1852, to break the power of the tyrant ROSAS; second, in 1854, at request of the Estado Oriental, to secure public order and preserve the existence of the Republic of Montevideo. Peace was only secured for a short time in 1855 anarchy again reigned. In 1861 another revolution broke out between the two parties, known as the "Colorados" and "Blancos." The "Colorados" were lured into laying down their arms, and were then indiscriminately slaughtered.

It will be of interest to our readers to know that there is now a regular line of mail steamships between New York and Rio de Janeiro, leaving the former city on the 28th of every month. The first vessel that ran on this route was the CORCOVADO, which left this port September 28. The establishment of this line will give us every month the latest intelligence of the war on the Plata.

HOPE RASHLEIGH.

HOPE and Grantley Watts were cousins of a faraway kind; though he was that most miserable of all things—a poor dependent brought up on charity, therefore in nowise her equal according to the canons of society. He was a noble-hearted fellow this Grantley, with a frank, manly characteristics—a temper and an invincible sense of honor. His cousin, John Rashleigh, was substantially kind to him. He boarded, lodged, and educated him liberally; but for the more immaterial kindnesses of tender look and word, of kindness, sometimes carried by the generosity of love, of gifts or pleasures beyond strict deserving, the Rashleighs were also absolutely without stint. Hope, too, had used toward him all the insolence which girls of a certain type are so fond of showering toward young men. But Grantley possessed all her girlish impertinence with unwavering good-humor and patience; never seeming to see what would have fired many another youth to sarcy retaliation. In short, a weaker man of himself, returning good for evil, smiles for jeers, obedience for insolence, and service for ingratitude. And yet he was not mean-spirited.

At length Grantley was offered an Indian appointment, involving a salary of small value in his beginning, promised well, and was sure to lead to a favorable future if he were found capable and steady. There was no question of doubt or hesitation in the matter; he must go, willing or unwilling. Penniless young men, kept long idle at home, are generally glad enough to accept appointments where they can make their fortunes; but his cousin noticed that his tanned deadly pale as he spoke, and there was a look such as she had never seen in his eyes before, and which sent all the blood in a thick wave of mingled emotion to her heart.

A few days before Grantley's departure Hope was walking in the shrubbery by the long field. She had been out for a ride. Hope Rashleigh could get out of temper. Presently, up the long path came Grantley with his gun and his game-bag. He had been shooting. Hope raised her eyes from the book she had been reading; at least not exactly reading, for she was holding it upside down: and as she looked she colored.

"I am going to get you a partridge, Miss Hope," said Grantley, coming to a standstill for a moment as he came near to her. He always called her Miss Hope.

"I dare say the partridges will be safe enough from your gun," said Hope, laughing. But she did not look at him as she spoke; and somehow her insolence seemed a little put on and forced.

"Oh! I shall get one for you," said Grantley, smiling. "I may be good for very little, Miss Hope, but I am a fair shot, you know."

"I do not condescend to argue with you," cried Hope, shaking back her hair. "You are very rude to contradict me."

"I do not wish to contradict you, Miss Hope," replied Grantley, in a sweet, grave voice; "but you must and will allow me to differ from you if I see you to have a mean opinion of me, and try to set you right."

The blood rushed over Hope's face, and she turned away abruptly.

"I am going away—perhaps forever," then said Grantley after a short pause, speaking in a low voice, but not looking at his cousin—looking down instead, contracting the stock of his gun which just then needed an extra polish.

"Why is it you have been so constantly displeased with me, Hope? Surely no one has tried more sedulously than I to please and obey you—I can truly say from the very first years of my life here—why is it, then, that you are angry now? What have I ever done to make you hate me? If I only knew! I only had the chance to—to—"

Hate you?" she cried, quickly, turning full round upon him and raising her eyes with a strange look in them, which he dropped those eyes before, and said, coldly, "I did not know, Mr. Watts, that I had ever honored you enough to hate you. I have scarcely thought about you, and am sure I can warrant you in saying that."

Grantley turned pale. "Forgive me," he said, sadly: "this has been again one of my unlucky blunders."

Grantley then struck into the fields for one of the last days of partridge-shooting he was to have in the old country. But Hope, going deeper into the shrubbery, flung herself down on the moss at the roots of the trees and burst into a passionate flood of tears, hating and despising herself the while.

When Grantley returned in the evening he had only one bird in his bag, though game was plentiful this year and he was acknowledged to be a fair rate shot. His cousin, John Rashleigh, rallied him unmercifully, and Hope said in her most disdainful way: "I thought the covers would be tolerably safe, Mr. Watts!" But he only laughed, and said: "Well, Miss Hope, you must have it some morning for breakfast, for I am sure it is the last I shall shoot, and I should like you to have it."

To which answered Hope indifferently: "You are very good, Grantley, but I dare say Filo will be the only one to benefit by your last bag; I do not suppose I shall even see the creature."

Grantley colored; and Mr. Rashleigh himself thought she might have been more gracious just on the eve of the poor lad's departure, when perhaps they might never see him again.

Perhaps it was some such half discomfort—it could not be said to be conscious displeasure—that made him refuse Hope's request that evening. As usual, she was out of funds, and she had a special need for money at this moment. She wished to help poor Anne Rogers down in the fever, with her husband in the hospital and her children destitute, and she knew that her father would not give them a penny; for the man had been convicted of poaching, and Anne herself did not bear the most unblemished character, and had seen the inside of the county jail more than once in her lifetime. But these counter-pleadings did not influence Hope; and she thought only of the suffering family, which she could help, and of the bad luck of the history. Then she wanted to make Grantley a present before he went away, and she did not want her father to know of it; there perhaps she would have been puzzled to explain why she wished to keep such a trivial matter secret. She had never given him any thing—except, seven years ago, a wax doll; and he was almost the only person within her sphere to spend ever but now, when he was going to leave forever, she would give him something in a remembrance—something that would make him think of her when he was away. Poor, proud Hope, come then at last to this!

She knew that her father had money in the house when the went into the library to speak to him; for she saw him put a twenty-pound note in his desk yesterday, which was just the sum she wanted. And, indeed, he was on the point of doing so then. She would have got it had not for the first time in his life he refused her, and so sternly and positively that, as much in surprise as anger, she gave up the point at once and left him with a sullen flush of pride and determination on her face, which he did not see, sitting as he was toward the light, while she stood in the shadow.

John Rashleigh was a magistrate, and to-day was market-day at Canstow, the town near which they lived, when the Rashleighs generally resided in the upper room of the town-hall and dispensed law, and justice, to the offenders. His absence gave Hope the opportunity she wanted. Very quietly and very deliberately she unlocked his desk, and took from it the twenty-pound note.

"Grantley, change this for me," she said, giving him the note.

"I am not change it myself, Miss Hope," he answered, "but I will get it done for you in Canstow; I am going over there directly."

"Change it for me when you like," she answered, carelessly. "I want the money as soon as you can give it to me, that is all." And Grantley, do you hear? if you change it for me, do not tell him that I gave you the note to get changed."

"I will not," said Grantley, with a strange look in his eyes, "I am ironmonger's that day. He took a check which he had just received in the market-place from one of his tenants who owed him half a year's rent for his farm; and to save himself the trouble of going to the bank—banking hours, indeed, being over—he gave it to Grantley to get the surplus change; among which change came his own twenty-pound note, which he received in coin.

"Where did you get this, Tell?" he asked.

"Mr. Grantley, Sir," said Tell. "He changed it here and left it on the counter ago, and I put the instant camp apparatus," showing the young man's purchases.

"Mr. Grantley Watts?" cried John Rashleigh, flushing up; "he changed this note here?"

"Yes, Sir; I hope no mistake, Sir—nothing wrong?" asked the astonished Tell, respectfully.

"No, no, nothing! I was surprised, that was all. No, Tell, nothing wrong."

Home went John Rashleigh in a frame of mind more easily imagined than described. Things had come roughly with him for the last few years, and John Rashleigh was not the man to bear with the crossness of circumstance patiently.

"Grantley!" he called out as soon as he entered, and still standing in the hall; "Grantley Watts, where are you?"

"Here, Sir," said Grantley, coming out of the drawing-room, where he had been giving Hope an account of his proceedings, and emptying his pockets of her commissions.

"Where did you get that twenty-pound note you changed just now at Tell's?" shouted John Rashleigh.

Grantley was silent.

"Come, Sir, I want an answer!" cried his cousin. "Looking down and keeping a demure silence will not suit me: I want a simple answer to a straightforward question. Where did you get that twenty-pound note from?"

Grantley still made no answer; then he said he beginning to break upon him.

"I do not think any one in my household would do such a thing: two hours ago I should not have thought that you would have done it; and even yet, suspicious as the whole circumstance is, even yet I will accept any explanation that I can get, else I must hold you responsible for the theft."

"I did not steal it. I have committed no theft," said Grantley, looking straight into his cousin's eyes.

"Oh! you may dislike the word, but that I do not care for," said Mr. Rashleigh, disdainfully. "If you are not a thief, what are you then? If you did not steal it, how did you get it?"

"I did not steal it," was all that Grantley could say, repeating himself monotonously.

John Rashleigh was an impatient man as well as a proud and high-tempered one. At Grantley's second answerwithin he stared his hand and struck the youth across the face.

"Coward," he said, "have you not even the bad courage of crime? Dare you not confess what, by confession, would have been only a fault? If you had told me frankly how and why you had come to do such a thing, I could have understood it as a boyish liberty, and have forgiven it, but now I have only one way of dealing with the—a crime."

When he struck him Grantley involuntarily raised his own hand; but a thought came across him, and he retreated a step or two and dropped his guard.

"It takes the remembrance of all you have done for me, Mr. Rashleigh, and more than even this, to make me able to bear your insults!" he said, excitedly, his boyish face convulsed with contending passions.

"Tell me how you came by it," he then said, in a somewhat gentler tone; "if I have done you wrong, Ley, I am sorry for it, and will not bear malice; but tell me how you got that note."

"I can not, Sir," said Grantley, his heart swelling.

"Then you will not be surprised if I send for the police? Here, Lewis, Lewis, come here! The thing must be thoroughly sifted, Grantley; and if you are guilty I am sorry for the exposure you have brought on yourself. It is your own fault that the things come to such a pass, when they can never be mended again!"

"To send for the police will not make matters much worse for me," replied Grantley; "the servants have heard all that has passed, and my character will by none the blacker even for that discharge."

"At least we shall get to the truth then," said Mr. Rashleigh; "which will be so much gained."

"No, Sir," Grantley replied, firmly, "I shall not tell you even then where I got that money from, or how I came by it!"

All this while the drawing-room door had been standing half open, and Hope drew close to it, listening to what was passing. A whole world of feelings had possessed her by turns—fear for her father, fear for Grantley, and shame at the part in which in which her self-will and cowardice together had placed him —something, too, that was more than admiration at the consistency with which the boy preserved his faith and indignity that he might keep faith with her, and a kind of burning idea that what he had done had been after all a sin and a dishonor, and that confession would degrade her forever—all these thoughts and feelings passed through her mind in turns, and held her motionless and silent; with ever the bitter recollection that Grantley was but a poor relation at the best, and that the distance between them was immeasurable, running like a sorrowful refrain to each. But when her father spoke of giving him in charge, and called to servants, she hesitated no longer. Throwing the door wide open she stood in the hall.

"I took the money, papa," she said, boldly; and as she spoke she laid her hand in Grantley's, the first time that she had ever willingly done so.

"Hope!" exclaimed her father, "are you mad? You took that money? You?"

"Yes, papa," she answered, quite steadily; "you refused to give it to me when I asked you for it yesterday, and I took it this morning. I wanted it, and you ought not to have given it to me."

"If I had thought that to refuse it would have made you capable of stealing it, Hope, I would not have hesitated a moment," said the father, sternly.

"I do not call it stealing," said Hope, defiantly. "It was only taking what I had a right to, as I locked your desk with my own key, and gave the note to Grantley to get changed."

John Rashleigh turned fiercely against the youth. "How dare you, Sir, abet my child in her folly?" he exclaimed, passionately. "What was folly in her, and excusable, considering how I have always humored her and accorded to her wishes, and remembering that all she is is more child still, was downright wickedness and dishonor in you. And how do I know but that you instigated her to it? How do I know but that it was your due in reality, and she but the innocent tool of your cunning schemes? You bought a precious guaranee for yourself, and paid for it with my money, did you, Grantley, the whole thing looks too black yet for your whitewashing."

Grantley accounted to me for that camp thing," said Hope. "Do I not tell you, papa, that it was my own doing from first to last? Grantley does not know where I got the note from. I only asked him to get it cashed for me. But I asked him not to tell you that I had done so, because I was afraid you would be angry with me, and I meant to tell you when you were kind again." This she said coaxingly.

"I could not break my word to Miss Hope," said Grantley in a low voice, but firmly; "and I should have thought, Mr. Rashleigh, that you would have known me too well to have suspected me of such a thing as this. What Miss Hope had the right to do was another matter, but it would have been a theft in me; and men (here Mr. Rashleigh smiled a little satirically) "do not become thieves all at once. Yet I do not think you have ever seen much want of honor in me!"

"I will not have that tone taken," said Mr. Rashleigh, harshly. "You have done ill, Grantley, and it is absurd to attempt to give yourself the airs of injured innocence, and as if you had the right to blame me because I suspected what was so entirely suspicious. And what do I know yet? Have no proof; only your own word and Hope's assertion, which, for aught I know, may be merely her generous desire to get you out of a perilous position by taking the blame on herself. I can scarcely believe her guilty. To have gone into my room in my absence—unlock my desk—take the money I had refused her only a few hours ago—to steal—I can not believe it! I will not! You have been at the bottom of it, Grantley; you have had some hand in it!"

"Now, papa, how can you go on so?" cried Hope, thoroughly frightened. "Do I not tell you that Grantley is innocent, and that I have been the only one to blame? What more can I say to convince you?"

"It is not an easy matter to convince me that my child has committed a theft," said John Rashleigh, gravely, and turning away his head.

"I did not think of it as a theft at the time, dear papa," she cried, flinging herself into his arms. "I wanted it for poor Anne Rogers, chicky; I did not mean it for myself. I only meant to take it myself for having been so disobedient and willful, and do not blame or accuse Grantley any more. I am the only one to blame. He has been far nobler than I deserved." Here she burst into tears, and buried her face in her father's breast.

John Rashleigh could not resist this. Hope had never yet been unforgiven, even when she had not been penitent, and the tender, unreasoning love of the proud to-day could meet with nothing but the most fervent response.

"Do not cry, Hope. Dry your eyes, child," he said, tenderly. "There, there! Let us have no more about it. I quite believe you, and I quite believe that you did not know you were doing any thing wrong, and that you were only thoughtless and impulsive, as usual, my child. As for you, Grantley," in a stern way that I accused you so hastily; so, shake hands, and think no more about it. As you can repay the money, I will not blame you for sorry," he added, pleasantly, as Grantley still hesitated. The blow on his cheek yet stung, and it was rather early days for him to forget that he was struck him. "No gentleman can want more than an apology, and a father can only express his regret in a way as shake hands, boy, and we will forget what has been a very painful misunderstanding."

That word did not do. Grantley had failed to do. Grantley grasped his cousin's hand warmly; he had conquered all his boyish pride and manly indignation by the sudden change of tone.

"I have made you suffer, Grantley," said Hope, as her father left them; and again she laid her hand in his.

"I would have borne more than this for your sake, Miss Hope," he answered, pressing her hand with warm soft of fire, remembering her kindness, she not haughty and disdainful as usual, but downcast, humble, and repentant.

"I do not know what we shall do without you, Grantley," she then said, very gently; and as she spoke she turned pale, and he felt her hand trembling in his.

"Oh! you will soon forget me. I have so often misdoubted you, you will be glad to get rid of me," Grantley answered.

"I do not think we shall," said Hope, in a low voice. And then there was a moment's silence.

All this time they were standing with their hands clasped in each other's in the hall which had just been so much the scene of pain. Mr. Rashleigh coming through.

"You have not displeased me; it is I who have been ill-tempered," Hope continued, in a still lower voice, still softer and richer in its tones. "I ought to ask you for forgiveness, and I do forgive you go, for I have often behaved so badly to you."

"You must not do that," he exclaimed, hastily, and his eyes flashed with pain. "I could not bear that, Miss Hope. I can not bear to hear you even blame yourself for any thing."

Grantley's voice failed and then she stopped and said no more.

Still with her hand in his, still looking down on her as she stood with bent head and lowered eyelids before him, he drew just a shade nearer to her.

"You spoke? I do not hear."

She laid her other hand on his arm.

"I am much obliged to you for all that you have done for me these many years," she said, almost in a whisper.

The words were formal, but the voice and tone were not; the downcast eyes, the startled lips, the cheeks now crimsoning and now paling, the heaving breast, the pride swept away beneath the swell of this unusual tenderness and deep gratitude, all told of something deeper and warmer stirring in that impulsive heart than what those quaint, formal words expressed.

"Do not say that you are obliged to me for any thing, dear Miss Hope," he answered, hoarsely, scarcely able to speak; "it has been honor enough to me to be allowed to serve you."

"No one has ever done so much for me," she said.

"Because no one ever—" He stopped in his turn, and said no more; then, after a pause, he went on: "I have done nothing for you unwillingly, Miss Hope. If you have found me of any use to give you my life, I would have done it as freely as I would have given you a flower. I have had but one object—that of serving and obeying you; and I have had but one desire—that of pleasing you. I have given the first the best way I could, if I have failed in the last sadly. But I want you to remember me when I am in India." he went on to say, "and to remember me with as little dislike as you can; and I am so glad of to-day, for the last thing you will have to remember of me will be my faith to you."

The tears were swelling in her eyes, as in his.

"I shall never forget to-day," she said, gently, "nor how good you have always been to me, dear Grantley."

"I am glad you can say that, dear Miss Hope. I am glad I am going to India too, though I shall never see you again; for if I stand in England I should only fall out of favor again, and then I should have the pain of seeing you hate me more than ever, perhaps."

By this time the tears were running down her face.

"I have never disliked you, Grantley," she said; "I have pretended to do so, but it was mere pretence; and I have tried, but I could not. I like you better than you like me, Grantley—a great deal."

"Hope!"

What was it? What happened? What madness took him? Neither of them ever knew, boy and girl as they were; but Hope found herself clasped in his arms, with her arm round his neck, and their flushed, wet, youthful faces laid against each other.

But they were not in smooth water yet, and had something more formidable before them than even their own misunderstanding and childish blindness had been. Though John Rashleigh might forgive a girlish freedom like that of which Hope had been guilty, it was not to be easily certain that he would forgive this far graver sin. The light of his eyes and the pride of his heart, the for whom lords and princes would not have thought too good, to give herself away at sixteen to a poor relation! Hope knew all the trial to be passed through. It must be met, however, and that at once, unless she and Grantley would undertake a clandestine correspondence—for which the one was too proud and the other too honest; or unless they would give up each other —which neither would hear of. What she anticipated came to pass, in even exaggerated form. The father was furious; violent beyond any thing she had dreamed possible; but, glad as she was, she was firm, and Grantley would not yield her to long as she would hold to him.

Then came that terrible collision of two wills equal in strength, and the battle of love and pride which tears a man's very soul. Look which way he would, there was no comfort for John Rashleigh; and refusal or consent was equally madness and despair. But he must decide. The proud man had to balance with the father; and eventually the father won the day. Yet he would not consent to the marriage for many years even after they had come to rigor ago than what is generally held ripe enough; and when he did—when Grantley came back from India with a character and repute of his own, and his cousin found that both pour relation and daughter had not swerved a hair's-breadth from their young faith, she was reminded to marry without his consent if it could not be with—even then, when forced to yield, Grantley found his rosee decidedly cool with Thomas. His sweetness of temper though conquered before the end came; and when John Rashleigh was dying he confessed that Grantley had been the best son, and the dearest, father ever had; and that now, when the things of this world were slipping away from him and he was beginning to learn their emptiness, he was glad that Hope had married one who, by his better influence, had made her a nobler and a gentler woman.

"But you were a thief after all, my boy, and stole a greater treasure than a paltry bank-note," he said, lovingly, not an hour before he died.

JOHN BUNYAN RECITING THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS TO HIS FRIENDS IN BEDFORD JAIL.—FROM A PAINTING BY G. F. FOLLINSBEE.—[SEE PAGE 670.]

"JOHN BUNYAN RECITING 'THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.'"

THE character and circumstances of JOHN BUNYAN alike marked him out for persecution in a controversial and intolerant age. Even in 1637, in the best days of QUEEN ELIZABETH, he was indicted at the Assizes for preaching at Eaton. The Presbyterian ministers who were then in possession of the Churches of Elvings and Gamlingay could not endure that an "illiterate tinker and an unordained Baptist minister" should be suffered to preach. The ignorance and malicious were stirred up to circulate rumors that he was a "witch, a Jesuit, and a highwayman!" After the Restoration, it, of course, not surprising that he should have been one of the first persons punished for nonconformity. A warrant was issued against BUNYAN as he had been a dangerous person, the head and front of his offending being that he went about preaching, because he was known to be hostile to the restored Church, and especially to the prescribed Liturgy of that Church; and probably it might be remembered that he had served in the Parliamentary army. Accordingly, he was arrested at a meeting in a private house, and committed to Bedford Jail by the Justice before whom he was brought. At the ensuing session he was indicted as a person who "devilishly and perniciously abstained from coming to the parish church divine service, and who was a common upholder of several unlawful meetings and conventicles, to the great disturbance and distraction of the good subjects of this kingdom." The sentence which followed upon these resolutely refusing to attend or give any promise not to preach is equally characteristic of the time: Then said the magistrate, "Have you anything? You must be sent back again to prison, and there lie for three months following: and at those months' end, if you do not submit to go to church to hear divine service, and leave your preaching, you must be banished the realm. And if, after such a day as shall be appointed you to be gone, you shall be found in this realm, or be found to come over again without special license from the King, you must stretch by the neck for it. I tell you plainly."

These threats were certainly not executed to the full; but simply for conscience' sake and in the cause of religious liberty, JOHN BUNYAN endured an imprisonment of twelve years in Bedford Jail, and even then he did not. During part of this long period the strictness of his confinement was, however, much relaxed. The Journey to Egypt, he found a friend in "the keeper of the prison," the jailer allowing him to be almost like a prisoner at large, and to visit and befriend his fellow-men. He attended the meetings of the congregation to which he belonged, and on one occasion went to see "the Christians in London." This, however, incensed the jailer a severe reproof, and thenceforward for seven years BUNYAN was closely confined. Years of evil unto many days. To this imprisonment we doubtless owe "The Pilgrim's Progress"—a book probably more widely read than any other, save the Bible; for not only is it read wherever the English language is spoken, but it has been translated, to said Roman Catholic as well as Protestant readers, into every language of Europe. Had BUNYAN always enjoyed liberty it is probable, from all we know of his character, that he would have been too actively employed to compose "The Pilgrim's Progress," or, at all events, to work out so perfectly all the details of the wonderful allegory.

Of the picture engraved little further need be said by way of illustration—the artist tells his story so well. Bewick in reciting with characteristic fervor some scene of the "Progress"—let us suppose it to be the story of Christian and Hopeful imprisoned by the people of Vanity Fair—which scene he has just composed on the desk to his right, under which lies the book—fills the jailer with the "Book of Martyrs," his constant companions. His listeners are two Bedford friends and the good jailer, standing by the fire at his side, while, reclining under BUNYAN's arm, is the poor little blind daughter who was long a daily companion of his captivity. The picture has great artistic merit, particularly as regards drawing and character, and is the work of a young artist studying at MUNICH.

Brandreth's Pills

VERSUS

Gunpowder.

The combination of sulphur, charcoal, and saltpetre makes Gunpowder. The ingredients alone have no explosive properties; it is the combination which gives the power. Brandreth's Pills are composed of vegetables. Singly they have little or no effect; but in combination they are of wonderful power in eradicating disease, and have well established the character of "Universal Remedy." And they are innocent as bread, but most effective in removing the matter of disease from the body.

FIRST PREMIUM

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING $5

MACHINE.

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity.

Originally patented May 13, 1862; Improvement noticed, Aug. 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most wonderful and elegant combination of mechanism, is now in operation, on the streamer running to and from Brooklyn, and is pronounced by all who have seen it in operation the perfect and practical machine, and with extraordinary rapidity, making 16 stitches to each revolution of the Wheel. Will sew, hem, fell, stitch, stitch, ruffle, bind, braid, cord, tuck, gather, &c., &c., requires no change of thread in sewing on various kinds of goods, and will last a LIFETIME. It is so self-instructing as only to require a few moments' attention to learn its use, and received the approval of all the principal journals and by those who have seen it.

"For the dressmaker it is invaluable; for the household it supplies a want long felt, and for the tailor it is perfect."

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a strength and beauty of stitch, makes the ravishing seam."—New York Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine will be prosecuted for linking-mail or the parties. Single machines sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, receipt of the price, $5 00. Liberal terms over sharing field at once to its influence. Price $2. Send for circulars and terms to the GEM S. M. CO., 323 Broadway, Street, Philadelphia. Circulars sent free.

I Can Not Sing the Old Songs.
WORDS AND MUSIC COMPOSED BY CLASSES.
I can not sing the old songs
I sung long years ago,
For heart and voice would fail me,
And foolish tears would flow;
For bygone hours come over my heart
With each familiar strain:
I can not sing the old songs,
Nor dream those dreams again.

THE FENIANS.

PHYSICIANS say of certain periods, that they are characterized by a predisposition toward certain specific forms of disease, and that as soon as the exciting cause offers all the conditions necessary to the existence of the malady are realized. So in certain countries there seems to be always a predisposition toward revolution, which for its full expression only needs some exciting motive from without. Particularly is this the case in Ireland. Let there be unusual tumult any where in the world, and it is sure to be echoed back from Ireland in some outbreak, which is generally as hopeless as to its end as it is ill-advised in its manner and conduct. The American Revolution of the last century was followed by the Irish Rebellion of 1798; and we all know how that rebellion ended, in the triumph of the few but well-disciplined English troops after entire counties of Ireland had been devastated. Again the French Revolution of 1848 was immediately followed by another outbreak. And no sooner is the great Southern rebellion put down in this country than it is repeated on a small scale among the bogs of Ireland by the Order of Fenians. Long ago England assumed of her own motion the responsibility of governing Ireland. Her government has consisted in setting up in that country a Lord-Lieutenant, an established Church, and a landed aristocracy, and in levying taxes upon the Irish for the support of all three. She abrogated the Irish Parliament—but what has she given in its place? She checked the spontaneous growth, which was, Heaven knows! sufficiently unpromising, but has she ingrafted Ireland with any fruit more promising? The consequence of British government has been simply this—that a nation's growth has been checked, and where we ought to find abundant agricultural prosperity we find a boggy waste; and where we ought to find a civilized race of men we find a people uncultured, ignorant, and so poor that when their one harvest—the potato-crop—fails them they must either starve or emigrate. The history of Irish emigration to America tells a sad story of English indifference toward the Irish race.

But we find in this indifference no excuse for Fenianism. The revolt is only a stab at Ireland by Irishmen themselves. Better governed, the Irish would be less ignorant, indeed, than to undertake so hopeless a revolution; but it still remains also true that there is no immediate and present wrong which could be redressed by even a successful revolt. Whatever may be true of the past, certainly to-day the prayer of Ireland should be to be delivered from herself. Her only hope of relief now lies in England. Throw aside the Lord-Lieutenant now and repeal the Union—and in the place of British indifference will come the absolute and positive despotism of the Roman Catholic Church. There is an infinitely nobler and more liberal sentiment toward Ireland in England than there is in the hearts either of the Fenians or of the papists, who find it convenient to denounce Fenianism only because it is not a movement in their own interest.

The Irish are not the most liberal of peoples. They are not loudly against the tyrannies of England; but we have seen here, in the streets of New York, some evidences of a spirit of revolt which would nourish in their hearts against the downtrodden negroes, whose only crime was that they took up with the Irish desired the liberty of John and the peaceful enjoyment of the fruits of their labor.

The Fenian movement does not appear to be a very formidable matter. It has been very poorly met by the Government. On the 16th of September, when a band of drum, suddenly and effectually, the police broke into the office of the Fenian "organ" in Dublin—the Irish People—and laid hand on the persons and papers of a group of astonished compositors. At the same moment arrests were effected in Cork, and since that moment various captures have been made not only in Ireland, but in England.

We publish on our first page several engravings relating to the conspiracy. The large cut represents the interior of the Irish People in Dublin. The other illustrations are of Fenian meeting-houses in a blacksmith's shop in Cork, the day after the seizure of the Irish People.

The trial of about sixty Fenians who have been seized was to commence on the 25th of October. By Christmas-time the Fenians will cease to be talked of or thought of—and so much the better for Ireland.

THE DOOM OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

THE Democratic party is doomed. The Federal party fifty years ago opposed a popular war with unanimity. The Democratic party opposed a vital and inevitable and glorious war, and it is perishing before our eyes. In the face of New York it professes to hope for a little longer life. But it is the profession of despair. No well-informed man believes for an instant in the recovery of so exhausted and wretchless a frame; no man of real hope is based upon the fact that it has formally recanted, eaten its own words, and confessed its own dishonor and defeat. It is true, for a time that, the rebellion having been defeated, its great ally should be annihilated; and the character of the American people is shown as capable in their steady union for the overthrow of a false party as it was in the destruction of a foul conspiracy.

Maine, Vermont, California, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Iowa, and Indiana are the States that have thus far voted, and, like patriot soldiers when the roll is called, they answer each one to another to the Union call, and even louder than last year, "Here! here!" Even New Jersey, hitherto the perfect type of a modern Democratic" State, begins to blush that she has so long faltered in the good race; and in the total rout of the Chicago platform party she will ask gives hope that she will not much longer be chained to the corpse of slavery or modern Democracy.

The Democratic leaders are receiving the severest lesson of their lives. They thought they could trifle with the national safety, and the people do not forget it. They thought they could oppose and thwart a war for national life, and when the indomitable patience and power of the people conquered, could turn and coolly throw up their hats, shout victory, declare that they had been heart and hand in the war, and so bamboozle the people they had done their best to ruin.

Do they suppose the people have returned from whipping rebels in the field to be fooled by copperhead cries in a platform? Do they agains they can deceive the popular intelligence by hiding behind a General? They might remember the experiment of Lee at Antietam, who tried to hide the whole Chicago platform behind a General. But whether the platform were too large or the General too small the cheat was plain enough, and was heartily and contemptuously rejected.

The Democratic party was opposed to the war. Individual Democrats, indeed, boldly broke with their party to go with their country; but the party was ruled by HORATIO SEYMOUR, VALLANDIGHAM, the WOODS, and men in sympathy with them. Its votes in Congress, its orators, its national convention pronounced against the war. It was not only destroyed at the election, it was despised, and now the same old leaders ask the confidence of the people.

This year it makes a feeble show of supporting the President. We say feeble, because although in the State of New York it declares for him unreservedly, and like a desperate gamester JOHN VAN BUREN calls him his candidate for the succession, yet in the other States the support was conditional, and in New York it is offered by SEYMOUR, GREEN, and his most malignant followers of last year. It is at best only a transparent trick to come into power.

But the times are too serious for tricks. Every voter asks himself what will these men do if they come into power. He finds the answer in JOHN VAN BUREN'S speech. That gentleman throws the whole blame of the war upon the North, upon the loyal States. He shows the same old truckling servility to the late rebel chiefs that originally brought on the rebellion. But Mr. VAN BUREN and all his associates upon the Chicago platform will learn that the plantation whip has lost its terrors. If the fate of the party which opposed the war of 1812 has not instructed them, the elections of this autumn will teach them that the people of this country will not rend a party which played into the hands of the national enemy, until it has changed not merely its professions but the leaders who have inspired universal contempt and distrust.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE COLORED TROOPS.

IT should be the merest matter of course that the President of the United States, speaking to a large body of colored people especially to those who had risked their lives in the common defense, should express his faith in equal rights. But the fact that the Government is under the control of the party which denies and insults the American principle that its plain affirmation by the President is a striking and significant fact, showing that the party is rapidly returning to the simple faith of the fathers, who held that every man has natural rights which every other man is bound to respect.

Such a speech is still more impressive when made by a President who has learned by the most bitter personal experience that the denial of that principle leads logically and inevitably to the unimaginable horrors of civil war; and who, during that war, acting as military Governor of his own State, availed himself of it from complicity in the effort to destroy the National Government, proclaimed universal freedom, and declared himself the friend and liberator of the enslaved race to lead them out of bondage into liberty.

And such a speech is still more striking when uttered by a President who, it was hoped by the party hostile to equal rights, would forget his own life, his own acts, his own solemn pledges, and join in the attempt to deny and humiliate the rights which the people had guaranteed.

It is for such reasons that the remarks of the President to the recently mustered regiment in the District of Columbia have produced so profound an impression, so cheering to every man who believes that the cause of the country can be permanently established only upon universal justice, so confounding to the political hucksters and wreckers of the party of pandemic, to the hatreds of baffled rebels to obtain a temporary party ascendency.

The colored men who stood before the President on their return from the battle-fields in which they had sustained the Government were the representatives of the race who in all the rebel States were the chief sufferers during the war; of those whose color was a sure sign of loyalty, and to whom every Union soldier escaping from the rebel prisons at Richmond, Salisbury, Tyler, and Libby to treat as they chose. The President, to the dire confusion of the rebels, called them "my friends." He said to them, "This is your country as well as any body else's country." He declared, "Every man's property is founded upon the principles of equality." He said "He that is most meritorious and virtuous and intelligent and patriotic is entitled to the highest without regard to color." He announced that "Liberty means freedom to work and enjoy the products of your own labor." He called them "my countrymen," and thanked them for the compliment they had conferred upon him by their call.

Those who have counted upon the President's treachery to the principles upon which he was elected have reckoned without their host. Those who hoped to see in his acts and bear in his words an illustration of what they foolishly call the "instinctive antipathy" and "unconquerable prejudice" of the white race whatever their color or condition have been fatally mistaken. President JOHNSON shows that he feels with President LINCOLN, who, in his letter to the unconditional Union men of Illinois, anticipating the glad day of victory in whose gray dawn he was translated, said with prophetic truth: "And there will be some black men who can remember that with silent tongue, and clenched teeth, and steady eye, and well-poised powder, they have helped their mankind on to this great consummation; while I fear that there will be some white men unable to forget that with malignant heart and deceitful speech they have striven to hinder it."

These last hoped that the successor of LINCOLN, who has faithfully continued his policy, would fall helplessly into their clutches. But turning away from the malignant heart and deceitful speech to the men of the steady eye and well-poised bayonet, he says, "My friends and countrymen, this is your country as much as any body's."

JONAH.

ROUTED every where in the States that have voted, terribly defeated even in the chief city of New Jersey, the last flickering hope of the party that prayed God to preserve the country from Mr. LINCOLN became President is the State of New York. Here they have flung every thing overboard—except JONAH, and he will swamp the ship. The party paper of the election under the lead of JOHN A. GREEN, editor of one of the most notorious Copperhead journals in the country, who nominated GERRIT SLOCUM at Albany, and of HORATIO SEYMOUR, who appeared with General SLOCUM as his sponsor at the meeting where he first spoke, and who is the only unmitigated JONAH with which any party craft ever put to sea.

There are those who say that the Union party entered the last election with a majority last year that it will surely lose now. But such an apprehension is expressed without thought. It was upon the Union sentiment appealed to the people of the State upon the ground that the war was a failure—that the rebellion could never be overcome—that there ought to be a cessation of hostilities, a recourse to the ultimate resources of statesmanship, etc., etc. Now the war was not then ended, and Mr. LINCOLN was not then known to be correct. Even Mr. GREELEY was in favor of offering terms. But this year Mr. SEYMOUR stands naked amidst the wreck of his triumphant boast. His "friends" did not rise in a counter-insurrection; and those terrible fanatics and Jacobins, GRANT and SHERMAN, swept the rebellion from the earth. Why should any body go to the polls and vote that Mr. SEYMOUR was right?

He and his political associates at Chicago and in the bloody streets of New York profess to support the President. But even if they are to be believed, they certainly support him no more warmly than the party which elected him. Last year he and his friends supported GEORGE H. PENDLETON, who declared that the only fault with the war was that the Government had no right to make war. Did he and they then believe that it was an unjust war? Do they believe so still? If not, when and where has the President said so?

The question is thus narrowed to a point. If the platforms of the two parties in New York are identical, how can any one call the people of the State most safely trust—HORATIO SEYMOUR and the WOODS, and JOHN A. GREEN and their packed convention of the Tammany host which elected ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON—which finished the war victoriously against the steady and unscrupulous politicians who now ask for power, or which maintains its shining ranks thus far stronger and more united than ever from Maine to California?

M'GOWAN.

WE observe that General SAMUEL M'GOWAN offers himself as a candidate for Congress in the Third District of South Carolina, and has issued an address which is held to be the chief recommendation of his views of those who are aspiring to control that State. General M'GOWAN was a conspicuous rebel soldier. He has unconditionally taken the oath of allegiance to the Constitution, and by the laws of the land his life is forfeit as a traitor. It is therefore interesting to consider the words and tone of his address, from which we make the following extracts:

"Relying upon the good faith and patriotic intentions of the President of the United States, we have done all that was required of us to restore our old relations to the Union, and the result is that we have what we have not been received into fellowship at Washington. That important act of justice and magnanimity remains yet to be accomplished. It is understood that a party will oppose the Presidents plan of reorganizing the States and giving to the negro equality of rights. I will insist upon this further dogmatic and crushing the States or the South as conquered provinces, and that they have forfeited their governments, and how they oppose our returning to the Union. We are in the Union they stood on an account of slavery. They waged war upon us because we would not legislate for them. They said that we propose to return without slavery they will object.

"In some respects we are at the beginning of our policy, as if we were a new State about to assume new relations to the Union; but we must never relinquish nor surrender to forget that in other respects we are an old State, with all the rights and privileges which constitute, and a history to preserve. Whatever may betide us in the uncertain future, the past, at least, is secure. South Carolina has never swerved from the path of honor, as she conceived it. We have a record of which none need be ashamed; and when any apostate son of hers declines or degrades it may she cast him out as unworthy of her. The devotion of every true son of the State adheres in adversity as well as in prosperity—in loyal through evil as well as good report, and in the midst of the gravest and most momentous 'stickels closer than a brother.'

"It may not be improper in this connection to say that, while I have approved the course of the State in seeking to restore her old relations with the Government of the United States, it has been upon the faith and expectation that the State, as soon as reconstructed, is to have entire control of the whole subject of her domestic affairs. The State, and the State alone, must be left to decide to whom she will give the right of suffrage or other political rights. A new code now must be enacted to protect and govern the population lately made free, to prevent idleness, vagrancy, pauperism, and crime. I am not prophet enough to determine whether we can succeed, but I think it is wise but it will be impossible to live in the country at all unless the State has complete control of the whole subject. I have hope that this will be permitted, and I think it is in accordance with our interests and true policy to sustain the President and the Democratic party in their efforts to restore the States to their position of equality, and to give them equal rights in the Government."

In other words, General SAMUEL M'GOWAN consents to a renewal by the imperial sovereignty of South Carolina of her old relations with the Government of the United States, provided that he is not mistaken in the good faith of the President. He alludes to the time when the sovereign State was in the Union and to the war waged against it, and has grave doubts whether to can continue to live in the country unless the State, which has never swerved from the path of honor, is left to do exactly as she pleases.

These are undoubtedly his sincere sentiments. We do not question them. We never doubted that his State really believed the doctrine of supreme State sovereignty. But we are curious to know of a man who says he is at this juncture a legislator for the United States? Would not General M'GOWAN oppose the bill to pay the war debt which supports us? just as sincerely as he engaged in the war?

Is there any thing in the assumptions and implications of this address which Mr. LINCOLN would not have heartily approved? Of course he is aware that by the law of Congress he is incompetent to a seat, even if elected. But does he not know that President JOHNSON, while announcing that Congress is the judge of the qualifications of its members, has also said that he hopes no man will be elected who can not conform to the requirements of that law? Does General M'GOWAN, or do his constituents at the South or allies at the North, suppose that we have fought this war to its issue in order to bring back JEFFERSON DAVIS, ALEXANDER STEPHENS, JAMES MASON, or their political opinions and purposes, into the Congress of the United States?

FREEDOM TO LABOR.

IN his late speech to the returning soldiers of the District of Columbia the President said: "Liberty means freedom to work and enjoy the products of your own labor." He had already said the same thing in his address in Washington on the 11th of May. "Freedom simply means liberty to work and to enjoy the products of one's own toil, and how much he may put into his stomach and on his back. I mean this in the most extensive sense."

It is in pursuance of this profound and settled conviction of the President that Governor SHARKEY, of Mississippi, has ordered that the testimony of colored men shall be received in all the courts. The Governor holds, of course, with the approval of the President, that all laws springing from the system of Slavery fall with the overthrow of that system; and the consequences of this position are most important. The colored man was disabled as a witness because he was a slave. Ceasing to be a slave he becomes a man, one of the population, in the eye of the law a citizen although not a voter. His testimony can no more be lawfully excluded than that of a person who is also a citizen although not a voter.

But the consequences are broader still. If this conviction of every Executive officer is to enjoy the product of his labor in the most extensive sense, no law can be rightly passed which shall in any degree bind apart from his own residence, or interferes with as completa a control of his labor and property as every body else in the community enjoys. A slave is, in the view of the settled laws, a chattel. He may be sold like a pig or a cow. He can hold no property except upon sufferance. But when he becomes a man and citizen he is by that act invested with all the rights of a man and a citizen.

Now what is called the lawful or legal condition of slavery is nothing but the tyranny of a majority. Against God, against nature, against the human conscience, against the spirit of the Constitution and good policy, the majority determine to deprive the minority of all their rights. They have done this in the late rebel States by force. What is to prevent their doing it hereafter? In other words, how are the rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United and of the State to be secured to the people of the State? By giving every man a voice in the Government. That is the American principle. The Government rests solely on the consent of the governed. Such a system is indeed not perfect; but experience proves it is the most practicable ever tried. Regarding every man as entitled to the same rights it secures them by conferring political power upon the same conditions. It is toward that end that the President wishes to see the country moving. This is what he means in saying: "This country is founded upon the principles of equality, and at the same time the standard by which persons are to be estimated is according to their merit and their worth."

The way in which this is to be done for the whole country is by a Constitutional Amendment equalizing every where the electoral qualification, and forbidding the exclusion of one man because he is not worth ten thousand dollars, and another because he is darker or lighter than his fellow-citizens. The main question is one of equal rights. Until those are asserted and protected we shall have no peace.

HOW TO BRING DOWN PRICES.

THE Secretary of the Treasury made a speech at Fort Wayne, Indiana, on 11th, in which he avows his policy to be one of contraction, and declares that if Congress does its duty at the coming session the volume of currency will at once begin to be reduced. On the other hand, the controller of the currency lately wrote a letter, in which he predicted that instead of curtailing the currency Congress would authorize an issue of $200,000,000 more National Bank notes for the use of the Southern States.

The subject is so vital that the markets vibrate with every expression of official opinion. Words lightly spoken by official personages in political gatherings or hastily written to political friends affect immediately the price of the poor man's coat, supper, and winter fuel.

Contraction of the currency would involve lower prices for gold, food, clothing, rents, labor, merchandise, and property of all kinds.

Expansion of the currency would involve higher prices for labor, gold, and for many kinds of merchandise and property.

Unwisely whether the currency is to be expanded or contracted involves higher prices for every manufactured article and for rents, unwisely the value of labor, gold, food, merchandise, and domestic produce, and, in the words of the Secretary of the Treasury, "converts many persons into gamblers, and seriously diminishes the labor of the country."

Of the three the last is the worst. Currency contraction would be met and outlayed with the help of a general reduction of expenditure; and currency expansion may be borne, if care be taken—as it almost always done—to see that wages advance in proportion to the advance in the cost of commodities. But it is beyond the power of sagacity to make both ends meet in households of reckless people, when the policy of the Government is constantly alternating between contraction and expansion; when one Secretary of the Treasury wants us to expect a reduction of the currency, and another predicts an increase; when the Treasury issues "proposals for funding," and new legal tenders at the same week; when, on the one hand, actual expansion exacts of us two prices for butter, coal, and flour, while, on the other, imperfect contraction produces the same invoice as much as we otherwise should for blankets, rent, and cotton cloth.

If the Secretary of the Treasury can contract the currency, let him do so, and do so at once. He need not wait for acts of Congress. The power has already been given to the banks. We all understand, without further information on the subject, that irredeemable paper money is an evil, and that the country will not be sound and prosperous or the people made comfortable until we get back to specie payments. If it be in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to contract the currency largely a greenback dollar is worth a hundred cents in coin, he is the worst criminal in the land if he fails to exercise that power. But if he can not contract the currency: if, even now, his ordinary receipts from taxes, customs, and loans are short of his expenditures, and new loans are requisite to supply the deficiency: if the very liberal proposals of September 29 for funding the inert compound legal tender of last year have fallen flat upon the market: if, even if it is cruel to threaten that which he can not perform, and to aggravate the uncertainties which already hamper all kinds of business:

One of the severest trials of these times to the poor is high rents. Why are rents high? Not because there is too much currency, but because there are too few houses. No new houses are being built, because capitalists are all expecting Mr. MCCULLOCH to contract the currency, in which case materials and labor will fall, and house-building will cost 25 @ 50 per cent. less than now.

Then clothing of all kinds, especially domestic woolens and cotton cloths, is extravagantly dear—so dear as it was when gold was 275. This is partly owing to the harder one to the high price of food and rent. In this climate even the poorest must be clad, and prices have so long been high that paupers who waited for better times have worn out all their old clothes.

"You ask me, Sir," said a New England capitalist, who had been confessing to his income from manufacturing stocks—"do per cent. in one, do in others, 50 in others, and in one 600 per cent. in a single year: "you ask me why I do not start more mills? My reason is very simple. I have $200,000 in cash in bank and trust to Government to call awaiting a suitable opportunity for its employment in this way, and I can lay my hand on $8,000,000 among my immediate acquaintance which are lying ready for the same chance. But we are all waiting for the contraction to take place. We dare not invest our money with that contingency hanging over us."

Similar confessions will be made by capitalists in the iron and the coal trade. Established companies are realizing enormous fortunes, and the poor are being forced to pay exorbitant prices for the necessaries of life, because the dread of contraction operates to prevent competition.

If, instead of predicting an early decrease of legal tenders, Mr. MCCULLOCH were to say to the public: "There will be no increase of currency; but, on the other hand, there will be no decrease beyond the possible excess of the Government's revenue over its expenditure," business men would know what they had to expect, capital would immediately flow into manufacturing channels, the price of clothing, coal, iron, rents, etc., would be reduced by competition, the manufacturers of New England and Pennsylvania would be obliged to contest themselves with annual dividends of ten per cent., the Reading Railroad and its companies would not pay twenty per cent. and over, and rents would fall very considerably.

Of course, if the Secretary of the Treasury can perform as well as promise, he is right in gambling. Under such circumstances we might be cheerfully borne if we could see our way clear to the early resumption of specie payments. Prices are high because of the currency that is at hand. But how little the mercantile community believes in the Secretary's power to resume or to contract the currency is seen by the firmness of all the markets on the reception of his Fort Wayne speech. Men of business do not believe a man can reduce his indebtedness until his income exceeds his expenditure. Nor do they consider that exchanges of one form of indebtedness for another, such as taking 7-30 bonds instead of six long bonds, can be carried beyond a certain point without defeating their own object. So long as money remains in circulation in the form of tenders for long bonds, if the latter are offered at a price below that which rules or is likely to rule in open market, there will be a very substantial proportion of the currency afloat has been thus withdrawn from circulation money will become tight, and instead of buying more long bonds capitalists will realize what they have for currency. Then the funding will stop, and owing to the financial embarrassments caused by the contraction the Government's revenue will decline. If a large amount of currency has been withdrawn in the interval the decline will be serious, as it will require the Government to negotiate new loans to pay interest and meet public expenditures. And the supply of United States securities will then be properly limited so far to exceed the demand as to cause a heavy decline in the price—with contingencies, so far as the National Banks are concerned, upon which it is unnecessary to dwell.

It may be said of our financial policy at the present time, as Lord MANSFIELD said of political decisions, that the wisest decision of all was a decision. A bad policy, like a bad ruling in law, may do mischief. But men may shape their business and their conduct to suit even the worst policy or the most unwise legal precedent. When, however, the law and the policy are undetermined, or when a policy is announced which is not carried out, or not to be carried out, no man can tell which way to steer his boat, and capital withdraws from enterprise, and cheap the public to the penalty of inexperience.

It is satisfactory to remember that Congress will meet in six weeks. Mr. MCCULLOCH, of course, has the ability and he has probably been here never been any question, will then have an opportunity of presenting in extenso his plan for the contraction of the currency, and it may be feasible. There are arguments in its favor than have yet been dreamed of in Wall Street philosophy. Congress, it is to be hoped, will act upon the subject with becoming promptness. This will be a very hard winter for the poor; all the necessaries of life are as high as they were when the Government was passed away. Whatever legislation can do for their relief should be done, and done at once.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

THE Committee from the South Carolina Convention which waited upon the President to ask a pardon for JEFFERSON DAVIS were told that the President was overwhelmed; it ought to be determined by the highest tribunal and the fact declared, even if clemency should come afterward." This is in accordance with all the President's assertions in the spring, that treason is a crime, not a difference of opinion, and that it is the highest crime known to the Constitution. The phraseology of the speech, however, will undoubtedly be accepted as an indication of the fate of DAVIS. If tried and convicted, clemency, upon some terms, will follow.

MR. DAVIS, it appears, has been playing the shrew. When the Committee asked if she might not be allowed to pass out of Georgia into South Carolina the President said that his letters from the lady "were not very commendable." One of the Committee observed that she was a woman "of strong feeling." Yes, added the President, "and of strong temper. Manifestations of temper and defiance do no good." The good lady has probably been scolding the President like a vixen.

The Committee hoped that the President had seen that they accepted emancipation in South Carolina; but the difficulties of regulating the labor and restraining vagrancy were very great. The President replied, with great good sense, that there was not so much danger as they supposed. Pass just laws and society will soon be settled. "Let us get the general principles," said he, "and the details and collaterals will follow."

The Committee then expressed entire confidence in the President's purposes and actions, and hoped to deserve his in return. The President said he did not doubt it, and believed that good feeling would return through mutual confidence. He was not looking to future preferment, and wished only to see the people once more united and happy.

The Committee were introduced by W. H. TRESCOTT, a rebel lately pardoned, Assistant Secretary of State under BUCHANAN, now the State agent of South Carolina at Washington. They departed without the pardon of DAVIS.

"I leave the country for the future," said the President, upon his accession, "to be disposed of as they arise, regarding myself as the humble instrument of the American people. I do this, as in all things, justice and judgment shall be determined by them."

THE ENGLISH REBEL LOAN HOLDERS.

THE London Times indignantly denounces the list of subscribers offering by the rebel loan as a malicious imposture, and declares that it is a complete falsehood to assert that the editor of the Times loses ten thousand pounds by the loan. Several of the other gentlemen named are writing letters to the same effect. HON. EVELYN ASHLEY denies that he has taken the rebel loan. MR. BENJAMIN, proprietor of the Morning Post, makes the same denial. MR. LAIRD, of Liverpool—whom we trust AMERICANS will remember as the builder of the Alabama—authorizes a similar denial. MR. GLADSTONE, Chancellor of the Exchequer, telegraphs his denial to the London Star.

But what do these denials mean? They charge with such fury? They applauded the rebellion. They reviled the United States Government. They sneered at the idea of ever subduing the rebel States. They extolled the rebels as high-minded patriots and honorable men, receiving an unanimous right and gallantly striking for liberty. MR. LAIRD defended them in Parliament and built vessels for them. The Morning Post chose its fortune to be bad, and refused to believe their overthrow. MR. GLADSTONE declared that JEFFERSON DAVIS had created a nation. What possible reason was there that these gentlemen should not add by money a cause to which they gave praise so freely? There is no shame in helping honorable men gallantly striking for right and liberty. There is no disgrace in the statement that they showed their faith by their works. The gallant gentlemen have indeed come to grief. MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS's nation died before it was born. But is it disreputable for an English gentleman to have helped the unfortunate? May he not honestly lump it to renounce a drowning man, even though his effort be in vain? Is simple humanity not estimable in England? Is English gentlemen hurry to exculpate themselves from the suspicion of actually aiding the American rebels with as much alacrity and indignation as if they were Irish Fenians.

It is a painful and ridiculous spectacle. If all these gentlemen are not ashamed of countenance and encourage a rebellion waged against equal civil liberty, an insurrection to overthrow a free government and establish a slave-empire, surely they should look at the impression of honestly meaning what they said, and of supporting with their purses a cause to which they devoted their tongues and pens.

TIMOROUS THANKSGIVING.
